Poetry. A CHARMING WOMAN. BY JOHN G. BAXE.

A charming woman, I've heard it said, By other women as light as she.

Intelligent! Yes, in a certain way; With the fascinating gift of ready speech.

As we were passing down Exchange street several years ago, we stopped in front of an auction room to examine the various articles that were exposed to be sold under the hammer.

"I should like this bureau if it goes low enough," she said, pointing to an old-fashioned article that was standing among other furniture.

"I don't exactly know how much it is worth, but if it sells for three or four dollars you may buy it."

"No, sir, I will call it noon and settle for it and take it away. I am very much obliged to you for your kindness."

"I have spoken to a cartman who will call here in a short time, and have it removed out of the way; for I suppose you will be glad to get rid of it."

"Not at all. I am pleased that I was instrumental of a little service to you, and I am glad to read that I shall always be ready to render it."

bring over three or four dollars, and am not prepared to pay for it tonight.

"I suppose it was foolish in me to give so much for it; but I promised you I would, and I would not value paying double the amount for the bureau, if I were able, rather than not have it."

"I am greatly obliged to you for your kindness, but would rather that you should keep it until it is paid for."

"I shall not take money at present," we remarked. "I can do without it. You may take the bureau if you want; and when you are able, at some future time, you may pay me for it."

"I have often thought of you," she remarked, "and have been tempted to call on you; but although I have not called, be assured I have not forgotten your kindness, and I never shall forget it."

"I don't recall your name," she said, "but I would rather you should take what I have," and bidding that we could take the money when we pleased.

Several months passed by, and still we heard nothing of the young lady, when one day not knowing but we might get some word from the owner, we took out all the drawers separately, and examined them.

"Without mentioning to a single individual what we had discovered, we immediately removed our objects for examination, who were, a chest and a bureau, the latter of which we found to be a bureau of the same kind as the one we had seen at the auction."

"It was a pleasant situation, a little from the road, with everything located near about the dwelling. As we were up to the ceiling, who should call on us, and we had so long been anxious to find her, she recognized me at once."

"I have often thought of you," she remarked, "and have been tempted to call on you; but although I have not called, be assured I have not forgotten your kindness, and I never shall forget it."

"I don't recall your name," she said, "but I would rather you should take what I have," and bidding that we could take the money when we pleased.

When we left, I promised to call on her soon again, and in the meantime to make arrangements for the bureau, but that I should first have my own affairs settled.

"I have often thought of you," she remarked, "and have been tempted to call on you; but although I have not called, be assured I have not forgotten your kindness, and I never shall forget it."

THE CANONDALE ROBBERY. William Rafferty, who was arrested in Brighton, N. Y., by Police officers, for complicity in the Canondale Bank robbery of January 14, has given an account of the way in which he and his confederates tried to conceal the money satisfactorily.

"I have often thought of you," she remarked, "and have been tempted to call on you; but although I have not called, be assured I have not forgotten your kindness, and I never shall forget it."
