Where Wood Comes From

If we were to take up a handful of soil and examine it under the microscope, we should probably find it to contain a number of fragments of wood, small broken pieces of the branches, or leaves or other parts of the tree. If we could examine it chemically, we should find yet more strikingly that it was very nearly the same as wood in its composition. Perhaps, then, it may be said, the young plant obtains its wood from the earth in which it grows. The following experiment will show whether this conjecture is likely to be correct or not. Two hundred pounds of earth were dried in an oven, and afterwards put into a large earthern vessel; the earth was then moistened with rain-water, and a willow tree, weighing five pounds, was planted therein. During the space of five years the earth was carefully watered with rain-water or pure water. The willow grew and flourished, and, to prevent the earth being mixed with fresh earth, or dirt being blown upon it by the winds, it was covered with a metal plate full of minute holes which would exclude everything but air from getting access to the earth below it. After growing in the earth for five years, the tree was removed, and on being weighed, was found to have gained one hundred and sixty pounds. As this estimate did not include the weight of the leaves or dead branches which in the years fell from the tree. Nor came the application of the test. Was all this obtained from the earth? It had not sensibly diminished; but, in order to make the experiment conclusive, it was again dried in an oven, and put in the balances. Astonishing was the result, the earth weighed only two ounces less than it did when the willow was first planted in it; yet the tree had gained one hundred and sixty four pounds. Manifestly, then, the wood thus gained in this space of time was not obtained from the earth; we are therefore compelled to repeat our question, "Whence does the wood come from?" We are left with only two substances—the water with which it was refreshed, or the air in which it lived. It can be shown that it was not due to the watery vapor, consequently, unable to resist the perplexing and wonderful conclusion—it was derived from the air.

Can it be? Were those great ocean spaces of wood, which are as old as man's introduction into Eden, and known in their vast but solitary luxuriance over the fertile hills and plains of South America, were these obtained from the thin air? Were the particles which unite to form our battle ships, Old England's walls of wood, ever borne the world about, not only on wings of air, but actually as air themselves? Was the firm table on which I write, the chair on which I rest, and couch of the house in which I dwell, once in a form which I could not as much as lay my finger on, or grasp in my hand? Wonderful truth! all this was air.
