The Influence of Music.

A spider was in the habit of descending by its thread on to the piano of the French composer, Gretry, as soon as the latter began to play, until one day he was accidentally crushed. Horses are sometimes agreeably excited by the tones of trumpets, but dogs disagreeably. They usually prefer a simple melody. Cats are also frequently enraptured by a plantive song.

A violinist noticed that a dog near him was especially affected by a certain tune; he howled fearfully, and seemed greatly distressed. The longer the tune was continued, the more did the dog suffer. At last he was seized with fearful convulsions, and, the music not ceasing, he finally breathed his last.

In Paris a musical experiment was tried on two elephants, an orchestra performing above their cage. The female elephant was especially fascinated. They were visably excited with dance music, so as to bite and grasp the bars of the cage, but were calmed down again with plaintive melodies.

Dr. Chomet, when sitting under the shade of a great tree near Naples, heard a rustling among dry leaves that made him shudder. It proved to be caused by a number of the small, greenish-gray lizards so common in Italy, evidently attracted by the tune he was humming. This occurred several times, and the lizards were so fascinated by the tones of his voice that they even allowed the singer to touch them.

In Hall's expedition to the Polar Sea, one of the crew found that the porpoises and whales might be attracted by whistling so as to come within the reach of his harpoon. According to him they never could resist the fascination of music.

It is said that persons who are deaf, or who stop up their ears, still feel the effect of music in a kind of fluttering at the pit of the stomach or a contraction of the throat—certain tunes producing this result more than others. Gretry noticed that his pulse was quickened according to the time of the music he heard. The celebrated singer Malibran, on hearing for the first time one of Beethoven's symphonies, was thrown into convulsions, and had to be carried from the room.

How Messages Are Sent by the Ocean Cable.

He (the ocean telegraph operator) taps the "key" as in a land telegraph, only it is a double key. It has two levers and knobs instead of one. The alphabet used is substantially like the Morse alphabet; that is, the different letters are represented by a combination of dashes and dots. For instance, suppose you want to write the word "Boy." It would read like this: "— . . . — — — . — — —"

B is one dash and three dots; O three dashes; and Y, one dash, one dot and three dashes. Now, in the land telegraph, the dashes and dots would appear on the strip of paper at the other end of the line, which is unwound from a cylinder and perforated by a pin at the end of the bar or armature. If the operator could read by sound we would dispense with the strip of paper and read the message by the "click" of the armature as it is pulled down and let go by the electro magnet.

The cable operator, however, has neither of these advantages. There is no paper to perforate, no "click" of the armature, no armature to "click." The message is read by means of a moving flash of light upon a polished scale produced by the "deflection" of a very small mirror, which is placed within a "mirror galvanometer," which is a small brass cylinder two or three inches in diameter, shaped like a spool or bobbin, composed of several hundred turns of small wire with silk to keep the metal from coming in contact. It is wound or coiled exactly like a bundle of new rope, a small hole being left in the middle about the size of a common wooden pencil. In the centre of this is suspended a very thin, delicate mirror about as large as a kernel of corn, with a correspondingly small magnet rigidly attached to the back of it.

The whole weighs but a little more than a grain, and is suspended by a single fibre of silk, much smaller than a human hair and almost invisible. A narrow horizontal scale is placed within a darkened box two or three feet in front of the mirror, a narrow slit being cut in the centre of the scale to allow a ray of light to shine upon the mirror from a lamp placed behind the said scale, the little mirror in turn reflecting the light back upon the scale. This spot of light upon the scale is the index by which all messages are read. The angle through which the ray moves is double that traversed by the mirror itself, and it is, therefore, really equivalent to an index four or six feet in length without weight.

To the casual observer there is nothing but a thin ray of light, darting to the right and left with irregular rapidity; but to the trained eye of the operator every flash is replete with inteligence. Thus the word "boy" already alluded to would be read in this way. One flash to the right and three, to the left is B. Three flashes to the right is O One to the right and one to the left, and two more to the right is Y, and so on. Long and constant practice makes the operatives wonderfully expert in their profession, and enables them to read from the mirror as readily and as accurately as from a newspaper.
