The Home Concert.

Well, Tom, my boy, I must say good-by,
 I've had a wonderful visit here;
 Enjoyed it, too, as well as I could.
 From all that way from home holds dear,
 Maybe I've been a trifle rough—
 A little nervous, but I will say—
 And very likely I've missed the kind
 Of your city politeness day by day.

How Marion Got his Rifles

The close of the year 1780 was a sad year for America. The British held the country from Charleston to the upper States, and in order to complete their conquest had established a chain of posts through the States, each of which was strongly fortified and defended by a good garrison. Organized resistance to the British there was none. On the American side the principal actors in the struggle were the men who composed the famous 'light brigade' of General Marion.

The favorite rendezvous of Marion was at Snow Island. This is a piece of high river swamp, as it is called in the Carolinas, and was surrounded on the three sides by water, so as to be almost impregnable. Here Marion had his camp. From this fastness he issued forth at pleasure to range the enemy's granaries, or capture a straggling party of his troops. Secure in his retreat, he had no fear of pursuit.

In the city of Charleston, the despotism of the British was at its height; the proud spirited people of that capital were held down by a grinding tyranny. Many of them were still open and uncompromising in their hostility to the English, while others, thinking they could best serve the cause in that way affected a hearty submission to the conquerors, and were seemingly the most loyal of all the King George's subjects. Yet, while the English saw this and congratulated themselves upon the good effect it would have on the colonists, these very 'loyalists' kept the American commanders constantly informed of all that passed within the British lines, and many a disaster of the English was in this way directly attributable to them.

One of these persons was a lady of fine social position and great wealth. Indeed, there were few persons in all Charleston over whose submission to the crown the British were more elated than they were over that of Mrs. Anne Garden. She was a young and beautiful widow, just twenty five, and for several years had been the standing toast of beau monde of the Carolinas. When the British took the city, she was one of the first to submit to the king, and since her house had been the favorite gathering place of the redcoat gentry. Many of Mrs. Garden's friends, who were staunch patriots to the last, quietly cut her acquaintance, and shook their heads in silent indignation when her name was mentioned and when they dared speak at all it was only to condemn the widow's treachery. In the camp of Marion, however, there was one check that kindled with pride and not with shame when the lady's name was mentioned; and as for General Marion himself, he could have told tales that would have started the widow's Charleston friends, had it been safe to do so.

While Marion was creating so great an excitement beyond the gates of Charleston, Mrs. Garden resolved to give a ball. Preparations were made on an extensive scale, and the loyal element of the city was in high feather. The splendid mansion of the young widow was dressed with flowers from cellar to garret, and blazed with lights on the evening appointed for the assembly, and the band of the garrison discoursed sweet music to the assembled crowd.

The entertainment was at its height, when the general near the door, who had just returned from a ride, and a young man, who was walking with him, entered the room.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,
 For restoring Gray Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color, with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment, it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling out, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a HAIR DRESSING, nothing else can be found so desirable. Containing neither oil nor dye, it does not soil white cambric, and yet lasts long on the hair, giving it a rich glossy lustre and a grateful perfume.

Every one was busy, and no one noticed that while these arrangements were in progress Lieutenant Wilson had drawn off from his party, and disappeared in the woods that bordered the road. Suddenly there was a crackling in the brush-wood, which caused the British troops to spring to their feet in alarm. As they did so, a voice, which sounded not unlike that of the young lieutenant, shouted loudly: "Surrender to you are all dead men!"

General Marion secured his prisoners, together with the arms, ammunition, wagons and horses, and set out, after a rest of a few hours, for "Snow Island." At the request of the bogus Lieutenant Wilson, he sent back one of the red coats to Charleston with a note to Colonel Watson, informing him of the trick that had been played on him by Lieutenant Wilson, so far from being a lieutenant in the Tory legion, was none other than the famous Charles Hampton, a captain in Marion's brigade who had planned and carried out the affair successfully—thanking the Col. for the excellent weapons and other materials he had sent him, and promising to do good service with them.

The British commander was furious when he read the note and saw the hoax of which he had been made the victim. He went in haste to Mrs. Garden, but the fair widow had sailed for England. He was compelled to swallow his mortification in silence, and a few years later when the war was over, his chagrin was not a little increased by the tidings which reached him, that Mrs. Garden had married the young officer who had tricked him out of his rifles.

A Thrilling Narrative.

In the fall of 1845, I was traveling eastward in a stage coach from Pittsburg over the mountains. My fellow travelers were two gentlemen and a lady. The older gentleman's appearance interested me exceedingly. In years he appeared fifty, in air and manner he was calm, dignified and polished, and the contour of his features was singularly intellectual.—He conversed freely on different topics until the road became more abrupt and precipitous; but on my directing his attention to the great altitude of a precipice, on the verge of which our coach wheels were leisurely rolling, there came a marked change on his countenance. His eyes lately filled with the light of intelligence, became wild, restless and anxious, the mouth twitched spasmodically, and the forehead was bedewed with a cold perspiration and with a sharp, convulsive shudder, he turned his gaze from the dizzy height, and clutched my arm tightly with both hands he clung to me like a drowning man.

"Use this cognie," said the lady with the instinctiveness of her sex. I sprinkled a little on his face, and he became more composed; but he was not until he had entirely traversed the mountain, and descended into the country beyond, that his fine features relaxed from their perturbed look, and assumed the quiet, placid dignity that I had first noticed.

"I owe an apology to that lady," said he, with a bland smile and a gentle inclination of the head to our fair companion, "and some explanation, and to my fellow-traveler also; and perhaps I cannot better acquit myself of the double debt than by recounting the cause of my recent agitation.

"It may pain your feelings," delicately urged the lady.

"On the contrary it will relieve them," was the respectful reply.

Having signified our several desires to hear more, the traveler thus proceeded.

"At the age of eighteen, and I fear (he smiled) light of head, a fine property on the banks of the Ohio acknowledged me sole owner. I was hastening home to enjoy it, and delighted to get free from college life. The month was October, the air bracing, and the mode of conveyance, a stage like this: only more cumbersome.—The other passengers were few, only three in all, one gray-headed plaiter of Louisiana, his daughter, a bewitching creature a foot seventeen and his son about ten years of age. They were just returning from France, of which country the young lady discoursed in terms so eloquent as to absorb my entire attention. The father was taciturn, but the daughter was vivacious by nature, and we soon became mutually pleased with each other, that it was not until a sudden flash of lightning, and a heavy dash of rain against the windows, excited an exclamation from my companion, that I knew how the night passed. Presently there came a low rumbling sound: accompanied by successive flashes of lightning. The rain descended in torrents and angry wind began to howl and moan through the forest trees. I looked from the window of our vehicle. The night was dark as ebony, but the lightning showed the danger of our road. I could see at intervals, huge jutting rocks far away down its side, and the sight made me solicitous for my fair companion. I thought of the mere hair-breaths that were between us and eternity; a single little rock in the track of our coach wheels, a tiny billet of wood, a stray root of a tempest torn tree, restive horses or a careless driver, any of these might hurl us from our sublimity existence with the speed of thought.

"Tis a perfect tempest," observed the lady as I withdrew my head from the window. 'How I love a sudden storm! There is something grand about the winds when fairly loose among the hills. I never encountered a storm like this but Byron's magnificent description of a thunder storm in Java, recurs to mind. But are we on the mountain yet?'

"Yes, we have begun the ascent."

"It is not said to be dangerous?"

"By no means," I replied in as easy a tone as I could assume.

"I only wish it was daylight so that we could enjoy the scenery."

"But what's that?" and she covered her eyes from a sheet of lightning that illustrated the rugged mountain with brilliant intensity. Peal after peal of thunder instantly succeeded, there was a heavy volume of rain coming down at each thunder burst, and with the deeper agony breaking upon our ears, I found that the coach had come to a dead halt.

Louise, my fellow traveler became pale as ashes. She fixed her eyes on mine with a look of anxious dread, and turning to her father, she hurriedly remarked:

"We are on the mountains."

"I recoiled with the unaccounted reply. With instinctive activity, I put my head through the window and called to the driver, but the only answer was the moaning of an animal, borne past me by the swift winds of tempest. I seized the handle of the door and strained it, as if I would burst it open. At that

Parson's Wonderful Memory.

Richard Porson had a remarkable memory. Being one day in the shop of Priestly, the bookseller, a gentleman came in and asked for a particular edition of Demosthenes. Priestly did not possess it; and as the gentleman seemed a good deal disappointed, Porson inquired if he wanted to consult any particular page. The gentleman mentioned a quotation of which he was in search, when Porson opened the Aldine edition of Demosthenes, and after turning over a few leaves, put his finger on the passage. On another occasion he happened to be in a stage-coach; presently there entered into it a young graduate with two ladies. This young gentleman endeavored to make himself seem very learned; presently quoting a Greek passage, which he said was from Euripides. The Greek scholar, who was dozing at the other end of the coach, awoke at the familiar sounds and drawing a copy of Euripides from the folds of his cloak, politely asked him to favor him with the passage. The student could not; and the ladies began to titter. Reddening, the youth said on second thoughts, the passage, he was sure, was in Sophocles. Porson thereupon produced a copy of Sophocles, and again asked him to favor him with the passage. The undergraduate again failed; the ladies tittered gently. "Catch me!" said he, "if I ever quote Greek in a coach again." Stung by the laughter of his fellow passengers, he said: "I recollect now sir; I perfectly recollect that the passage is in Aeschylus." His inexorable tormentor, diving again in the capacious folds of his cloak, produced a copy of Aeschylus, and again asked him to favor him with the passage. The boiling point was now reached. "Stop! stop!" shouted he to the coachman. "Let me out! there is a man inside who has got the whole Boedean library in his pocket!" On another occasion, calling upon a friend, Porson found him reading Thucydides. Being asked casually the meaning of some word, he immediately repeated the context. "But how do you know that it was this passage I was reading?" asked his friend. "Because," replied Porson, "the word only occurs twice in Thucydides—once on the right-hand page in the edition which you are now using, and once on the left. I observed on which side you looked, and accordingly I knew to which passage you referred.

Once, when in the house of Dr. Burney, at Hammersmith, with some friends, examining some old newspapers which detailed the execution of Charles I., he came across various particulars thought by some of them to have been overlooked by Rapin and Hume; but Porson instantly repeated a long passage from Rapin, in which these circumstances were all recounted. Upon one occasion he undertook to learn by heart the entire contents of The Morning Chronicle in a week; and he used to say he could repeat "Rodrick Random" from beginning to end. His stupendous memory, however, on account of his excesses, failed at last.—Chambers' Journal.
