When I saw sweet Nelly home ! Notes upon Types. for printing are Roman, Italic, and black let-The Roman is the predominant type in These nations, however, print some works in their own language with the Roman letter. That the Roman letter is superior to any other for beauty, clearness, and convenience, is generally admitted, and its use is probably becoming more general among all nations where the art of printing is known.-This letter doubtless ower its forigin to the nation from which it derives its name. It man, by the name of Aldus Manutius, who our constituency may be inclined to wink a in the year 1490 established a printing office little at the course we have taken on this in Venice, where he introduced improve great question, upon which we have sacrificed which has received the name of Italic. It was originally designed to distinguish such parts of a book as might be said not strictly to belong to the body of the work, such as prefaces, introductions, annotations, &c., which it became the custom to print in italics, and often constituted a quarter or third part of the work. In later times, however, the Italic letter has not been used so freely, extracts being distinguished by inverted commas, and notes, poetry, &c., by smaller type.

A sparing and judicious use of italies, for giving force and emphasis, to certain words and sentences in the body of a work, is doubtless well; but some writers use the letter so reely and improperly as to destroy its effect and render it ridiculous. In trying to make

Black letter was so called in England from English, from its having been used in early times for printing books of law, statutes, &c. It comes from the Gothic character, and is sometimes called Gothic. It is now nearly out of use, much to the satisfaction of printers and readers. Its broad face required more ink than other letters, and was was therefore attended, with greater expense.-The large quantity of ink was also objectionable on account of its giving a yellow cast to the paper .- The Printer.

I confess however, that this debate has enlightened my mind,— I was at first inclined to go against this appropriation, but the considerations which have been urged with so much force by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I confess, have weakened my convictions in that direction, and have almost induced me to go for it. If the appeal which he so powerfully and pathetically made to the honorable Senator from Georgia has not moved him, he must be impervious to eloquence and to pathos.
