Agricultural.

From the American Agriculturist.

Expensive Shelter.

In a recent trip over the Harlem Railroad, I saw sights that made me feel quite at home, and ashamed of my birth place. Connecticut ideas must have emigrated long ago across Byram River, and established themselves in Westchester, Putnam, Dutchess, and Columbia counties, and it had been fortunate for the country if they had stopped east of the Hudson. Snow covered the ground and a bleak northwester swept over hill and valley. There stood the cattle by the stack yard, working oxen, steers, cows heavy with calf, and heifers; their feet drawn close together; their backs arched; their hair erect—shaking pictures of discomfort and misery. They were not just let out of the barn for an airing; for there was the pitchfork sticking in the hay, showing that they had been foddered there, and the bare spots upon the ground, where they had lain down, melting the snow under them.—These were unmistakable signs that these cattle took the air for twenty-four hours in the day, without respect to thermometer or weather gauge.

I wanted to get out of the cars, and take the owner by the throat, and say to him, "You miserable Connecticut sinner, what do you mean by tormenting these dumb brutes in this way? Do you ever go to church? Do you read your Bible, touching the 'merciful man showing mercy to his beast?' Do you ever read Shakespeare to learn that the 'quality of mercy is not strained?' Yours is strained so tight that it never gets out of you, and you torment these poor creatures with the slow tortures of frost and tempest."

Is it not astonishing that farmers will practise this barbarity, after all that has been said in the Agriculturist and other papers against it for the last dozen years and more? Is it not a marvel that close-fisted farmers, with a keen scent for the fraction of a copper in trade, will waste hundreds of dollars in this wretched slip-shod custom? If anything is demonstrated in the experience of our enterprising farmers, it is the economy of stabling cattle in the winter, from November to April. At least one third of the fodder is saved by it, and the cattle come out in much better condition.

What would be thought of the wisdom of a farmer who should build a separate small barn for every animal upon his farm, instead of building one large one to accommodate the whole? It would be a terrible waste of lumber, and a monument of his folly. Yet he might better do this than to attempt to shelter and warm each by itself at the stack-yard, by superabundant hay. What would be thought of the man who, instead of building his little barns of lumber, should make them of the best hay, thatched from top to bottom? Yet this is just what the farmer is doing who follows this barbarous custom. The thatch is applied inside of the animal in the shape of fodder, instead of outside in the shape of shelter. The hay is consumed by slow combustion to keep up the animal heat, and how much of it goes, you may judge, who have watched the consumption of fuel on a zero night to keep up the heat of a room. If the animal does not have hay enough, the flesh and fat gathered in summer, go to make up the deficiency, and the creature pines, the ribs stick out, the hide grows rough and bristling. The brute is tortured, and the owner's purse depleted.

Make an estimate of the loss of this barbarism. If it takes two tons of good hay to winter a cow in the barn, it takes three to carry her thro' at the stack. With hay at thirty dollars a ton, here is a dead loss of thirty dollars. With ten nothing less in three hundred dollars, to say cheese next summer. Is not hay applied in the stack-yard a very expensive shelter?

Covering Manure.

We do not know but the results of some experiments instituted by Lord Kinnaird on his estate at Molehill, as to the comparative value of covered and uncovered manure, have before appeared in our columns, but they are brought to mind in an account of this farm just published by a Dundee paper, and are of such a nature that it may be well to call attention to them at the risk of repetition:

"The ordinary plan in Scotland is to collect all the manure from byres and stables into one monstrous dunghcap in the open court behind—and sometimes in front of—the farm-house; where it lies exposed to the action of sun, rain, and atmosphere, and consequently loses by evaporation and chemical action, some of its most fertilizing properties. Most people unconnected with farming, who bestow a thought upon the matter, have an idea that the covering in of the manure heap is chiefly an improvement by removing an eyesore and purifying the atmosphere; but, agriculturally, the results of this simple-looking improvement are so great as to be quite startling to the unpractical mind. In order to test the pecuniary advantage of the new system—to see, in short, whether it would pay to enclose manure heaps (which few would be apt to suppose)— Lord Kinnaird instituted a series of very careful and extensive experiments. He had a field divided into two equal parts, manuring one-half with dung made in the ordinary manner—i. e., by being taken out from byres into the open court, and afterwards applied to the land—and the other half with manure taken direct from the covered courts or boxes and plowed in at once. The result was that the portions manured on the latter system yielded the first year about four tons of potatoes per Scotch acre more than the former; and the second year yielded an excess of about eleven bushes of wheat and sixty stones of straw."

A Scotch acre, it will be remembered, is about one-quarter larger than the common or imperial acre.—Country Gentleman.

Practical Odds and Ends.

Sent by Subscribers to the American Agriculturist. Please send plenty more of the same sort.

To Light a New Candle Quickly—dip the wick in the melted tallow of one already burning.

Kerosene Lamp Chimneys wide at the bulb or lower part are less liable to break than if narrow.

Shaving Hint.—Suspend the glass so that only the part of the face to be shaved will be visible; there will be less danger of cutting the skin. Reason: a sight of one's eyes distracts attention from the razor.—Place the mirror where it will not reflect the light of a window into the eyes. The best place is where the light will fall upon the face, and not upon the glass.—When done, wash off all the soap, and finish with a little diluted vinegar, or alcohol, or cologne water. This will neutralize the effects of the alkali, preventing it from chapping the skin, or affecting the color of the whiskers.

Repelling Red Ants—Try setting the safes, closets, etc., on new bricks; a subscriber says this proved effectual.—A sponge with a little sugar sprinkled through it, will attract and hold hundreds of the insects, which may be killed with hot water.

Cast Iron Stoves are preferable to sheet iron; they radiate heat more freely and equally, do not cool off so quickly, and are much more durable.

Condensed Milk is the pure article made purer, that is, with a large proportion of its water evaporated. It is preferable to most "milkmen's" milk. Each consumer can add water to his liking, grading it from the cream point to the "skyblue."

Peeling Onions is a tearful employment.—A lady says it will be less annoying by putting them into cold water and immersing often while peeling.

To Color Butter.—For every 4 quarts of cream, grate 1 middling sized carrot, pour on it 1 pint of boiling water, let it stand until cold and strain the liquor into the cream. It does not hurt the flavor.

Curried Cabbage.—How is it prepared?

Poultry.—How can it be cooked, spiced, and canned for sending to the army or elsewhere? Will somebody who has done it successfully please give necessary directions for publication?

Apples for Hogs.—Daniel Emerson, of Summit Co., Ohio, writes to the American Agriculturist: "In my youth, my grandfather, one autumn, weighed four shoats and put them up to fat. I gathered sweet apples and fed to them. At killing time the hogs were again weighed and were found to have gained two pounds per day each. They were fatted only on apples, and the pork was very nice, sweet, and sufficiently firm. This year I kept my pigs penned, and during the summer daily gave them weeds from the garden. From the first of August for two months they had nothing but sweet and grafted sour apples, and since then, apples and corn. The largest came to the knife before the first of December, very fat, and made most beautiful and sweet pork. A farmer in a neighboring town pronounces an acre of even indifferent orchard to be equal in value for hogs to an acre of the best corn, year by year." Why not plant sweet apple orchards for hogs and for cows also?

Ashes on Potatoes.—Hard wood ashes are one of the most valuable kinds of manure, especially adapted to potatoes, which nowadays are so sensitives to decaying manures. Chester Belding, of Orange Co., N. Y., writes that he applied "unleached ashes to the potato hills after first and second hoeings, at the rate altogether of about 15 barrels per acre. Two rows thro' the centre, not ashed, yielded 197½ bushels per acre, the ashed, 280 bushels. There was no perceptible difference between rows ashed once and those ashed twice. Will ashes continue to be beneficial if applied? A dressing of ashes will show its good effects several years on grass, grain, etc., and marked good effects will noticed from liberal applications each year on the same land—but this is usually not an economical practice.—American Agriculturist.
