

Significance of the Moon on the Weather.

There is no more extensively known and universally believed fact than that the changes of the moon have some effect upon the weather.

The science of bread making, of moist broiling, stewing, roasting, boiling, of vegetable cooking and of preparing the multifarious small dishes of all sorts, which go to make pleasant the table, and all about it, is a science to understand, and practice.

We have often wondered why, with the immense quantities of maple sugar made in this country, chemical experiments were not made to diversify its woody taste and to clarify it so to resemble our lump or loaf sugar.

It is our day the popular maxim seems to be that we may look for a change of weather at every change of the moon.

It appears that there must be something to distinguish this from most other signs, or like them it would have its day and be forgotten.
