Farm Work for July.

This is a busy month with the farmer. It is now that he is called to the harvest field, where he will have his attention and energy constantly occupied in the arduous task of reaping the corn. There are but few operations connected with the management of a farm which are more laborious, perhaps, than harvesting; yet very few young men shrink from it. It is considered pretty work, and to one who has been accustomed to the work of the field, it is not without reason. But there are thousands who pretend to be expert workmen, who know comparatively nothing of its theory or practice. To get over the ground as to the influence of the soil, and to be able to reap or cut the corn, and to be able to do so without reason. But there are thousands who pretend to be expert workmen, who know comparatively nothing of its theory or practice. To get over the ground as to the influence of the soil, and to be able to reap or cut the corn, and to be able to do so without reason.

It is always well, especially for new beginners, to commence moderately, and not overdo themselves at first. It is much better to do half a day's work at a time, than to attempt to do more. It is better to do half a day's work at a time, than to attempt to do more. It is better to do half a day's work at a time, than to attempt to do more. It is better to do half a day's work at a time, than to attempt to do more.

Even after saying the preceding comments, the hoe should not be permitted to remain wholly idle. On dull days the hands should be taken to the cornfield, where they can be profitably employed as the more frequently the surface is stirred the more direct will be the influence of the sun's rays in the soil. If time can be afforded, the cultivator should be passed frequently through the corn plot, and every weed eradicated which may have found footing among the plants. In a dry time, a pulverized surface, and a great measure, the laboring and stirring effect of a well-tended field. If you contemplate sowing English turnips, the business should be attended to by the first or twelfth of this month. The best soil for this root, which produces a large value as a winter food for most animals, and especially for sheep, is old pasture land, enriched by yarding. It should be plowed in June, and frequently harrowed, in order to mix the excrement of the animals thoroughly with the soil, and to facilitate the hatching of such insect's eggs as may be contained in it to the detriment of the future crop. If your animals are not sufficiently numerous to insure a proper degree of enrichment, by yarding them nightly, you may resort to the use of a fertilizer, and house ashes are valuable adjuncts in the cultivation of the English turnip. If convenient, sow in drills; this will enable you to hoe, and weed them the plants, all of which operations, though generally neglected, are of essential benefit to the crop.

Your rats have now well acquired to be frequently hoed. If vacant places occur, let them be filled by transplanting. This is laborious work, but, if properly performed, it will be abundantly repaid. The rats have in a valuable root, and one that should be grown in large quantities by every one who raises sheep, horses, or black stock.

See that your sheep have a constant and liberal supply of salt. Salt and ashes, mixed in proportion of one quart to two bushels, and kept in a tub, should be kept in some place where they can obtain free access to it at all times. This is the month when the fly disease begins to molest the sheep; it is therefore important that you scrutinize the movement of your flock in order to ascertain when it commences its attacks. This fact will be rendered sufficiently obvious even to the most indifferent observation by the restlessness of the animals, and may be effectually guarded against and prevented, simply by keeping the sheep's noses with common tar.

Many valuable animals are annually lost by negligence of this precautionary duty. When the egg has once been deposited in the nostril, its expansion is extremely difficult, and it is not until the worm is hatched, and immediately commencing making its way towards the brain, canners making its bloody labors by the victim's death. It costs but little to apply salt to the nostrils, and will invariably prevent its attacks.

A PRACTICAL FARMER.

CURING AND CURING CLOVER HAY.

Clover should be cut in the morning, and after the dew has dried, it should be put into cocks, to complete the curing. In stacking it away, a peck of salt should be sprinkled over each ton of hay, as it is being formed into stacks. If too green, and the hay is to be used for stock, it should be well dried, and the hay should be well dried, and the hay should be well dried.

Advice to Young Men.

If you enter with a tenderly engaged in a courtesan with her arms round your neck, you are bringing a glass of poison under your eye, and you are drinking from the hemlock. You will never see it again, but you will see it again.
