O. G. HEMPSTEAD, Editor and Proprietor.

TERMS—ONE DOLLAR AND FIFTY CENTS A YEAR.

The Montrose Democrat.

VOLUME XI. MONTROSE, PA., THURSDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1849. NUMBER 13.

THE 100 A YEAR VISIT.

It took the rector about one hundred brother clergymen to supply the place and preach the sermons of Mr. Edwards. He then saw it clear enough that a hundred a year would not do in the city of ——, with the style of living which the people there had adopted, and which they would not change. He was not the man to return to his people and tell them that he had quite given up all hope of living upon their charity, and that he must look elsewhere for a support. He knew that he had many friends who would be grieved at his leaving them, and who would do what they could to increase his salary; but he knew also that the most they could do would be but little, and that it would be a constant source of anxiety to him to see how it was to be raised. He therefore resolved to look out for a new parish, and to tell his people that he could not live among them on a hundred a year.

He had not been long in coming to this resolution before he found a parish which he thought would suit him. It was a country parish, about twenty miles from the city, containing a population of about two thousand souls. The village was a pretty one, and the church was a handsome building, with a tall spire and a fine bell. The parsonage was a large and commodious house, with a garden and orchard, and about ten acres of glebe land. The salary was seven hundred dollars a year, and the pew rents were said to be worth as much more. The parish was a wealthy one, and the inhabitants were generally liberal and hospitable. Mr. Edwards had preached in the village church several times, and had been much pleased with the apparent kindness of the people. He had also been pleased with the manners of the vestrymen whom he had met, and with the general appearance of the village. He therefore resolved to offer himself as a candidate for the parish, and to preach a trial sermon on the next Sunday.

He did so, and was unanimously elected. He was pleased with the result of the election, and he was pleased with the manner in which the vestry informed him of it. They told him that they had heard him preach with much satisfaction, and that they had unanimously resolved to request him to become their rector. They told him that they had fixed his salary at seven hundred dollars a year, besides providing him with a house, and that they hoped he would not refuse their call. He told them that he was pleased with the result of the election, and that he would take the matter into consideration, and give them an answer in a few days.

He then went home to his family, and told them the news. They were all pleased with it. His wife was pleased at the prospect of living in a country village, where the children could run about and play in the fields, and where the family would be free from the temptations of city life. His daughters were pleased at the prospect of living in a country village, where they would be free from the restraints of fashion, and where they could dress as they pleased. His sons were pleased at the prospect of living in a country village, where they could have plenty of room to play, and where they could have the range of the fields, and the woods, and the streams. They were all pleased with the prospect of living in a country village, where they would be free from the temptations of city life, and where they could dress as they pleased, and where they could have plenty of room to play, and where they could have the range of the fields, and the woods, and the streams.

They were all pleased with the prospect of living in a country village, where they would be free from the temptations of city life, and where they could dress as they pleased, and where they could have plenty of room to play, and where they could have the range of the fields, and the woods, and the streams. They were all pleased with the prospect of living in a country village, where they would be free from the temptations of city life, and where they could dress as they pleased, and where they could have plenty of room to play, and where they could have the range of the fields, and the woods, and the streams.