Improved Farming Utensils.
We are advised to acknowledge that while mechanics and others are daily adopting the use of labor-saving machinery of all kinds, the farmers alone, who most need economical reduction in labor, remain incredulous and perverse in using the tools of the older time, instead of adopting those which would reduce their labor and increase their profit. Many farms within fifty miles of New York, are without a cultivator, and although it has been clearly proved that this instrument in many cases will do the work with a single horse, of forty men with hoes, still it is far from being in general use, and even many of our market gardens continue to use the hand hoe for such crops as might be equally well cultivated by a cultivator, and at much less expense. Even the hand cultivator will enable one man to perform the work of twenty men with hoes, and but few know the importance of this fact.

Now few farmers have hores, and still in many soils this simple and expeditious instrument is capable, if used at proper times, of rendering the soil pulverulent, and of leaving the surface of land to be sown, level, and free liable to attacks of insects, &c.

The use of drill machines for planting, is being more generally adopted, and thus the seed is more easily planted in an equable manner all over the field, and at the same depth, always yielding a larger crop and of more regular quality, but still, despite the acknowledged usefulness of this instrument, more than three quarters of our grain crops are planted without the use of this machine. Even the ordinary drill harrow, worked by hand, will, with many crops, save half the expense of labor in their culture. Instead of turnips, carrots, parsnips, or even corn, peas, beans, &c., being planted by hand and sometimes broadcast, they may, by the use of the drill harrow, be sown in drills equidistant apart, and with regularity of distance and depth in the drill. Thus the spaces between the drills being regular, the weeds can be kept down by the use of the horse or hand cultivator, instead of the tedious and expensive use of the hand hoe—and by the cheap and rapidly acting culture, may be kept continually loose and in good order—indeed, the best results in modern farming cannot be arrived at without sufficient economy, without the use of this instrument.

The use of a small sub-soil plow for cultivating corn, should not be overlooked, for with the instrument and a proper culti-vator, corn may be worked for half the expense usually paid to it.

When the corn is about four or five inches high or less, run the subsoil plow with its flat side toward the corn and a few inches from it to full depth, and the same on the other side of the row. This will not disturb the plant, but will leave the admeasurement and thoroughly disturbed to a great depth, ready to receive moisture and atmospheric influences, and enabling the corn roots to fasten, to run down in this subsoil cut, receiving all the portions of measure held in solution, which will all incline toward this cut. The cultivation should then be run in the broad space between the rows, to disintegrate the surface, and the two teeth may be formed like small plowshares, to run with toward the left or right—these teeth by being chisel-shaped, placing the ear on the right in place of the one on the left will take the root and from the hills whereon the corn is set, will need little or no hoing, and our work for it, will have been more than double that by ten times the cost of labor, with the common hand-hoe. Working Farmer.

Transplanting Trees.
The best time for the year for the business is next autumn. Some people think the fall is the best season, but it is not so. Transplanting in the spring has generally been followed with better success than in the fall. Two important things are necessary to obtain success, as follows:

First. Place the roots of your tree in a soil favorable to the formation of roots.

Second. Reduce the heads in such a manner as to correspond with the character of the tree, the condition it is in, and the season and situation in which it is placed.

Under all circumstances, it is unsafe to plant a tree without reducing its branches in such a manner as to compensate for the loss of root, and general derangement inseparable from removal.

If a tree has attained a considerable size, and has a branching head, these branches should be cut back according to circumstances. A tree with large and healthy roots and abundance of fibers, will sustain a much greater amount of head than a tree with short, poor, or badly matted roots, and few fibers. Apples, quinces or peach—will bear more head than pears or plums, and so on. Trees taken fresh from the soil and replanted do not require the same degree of cutting as those that have been transported to a great distance. Trees that are planted in a light, mellow, warm, favorable to the formation of roots, will require less cutting than those planted in a colder, still, where roots will be emitted slowly. Trees taken up with the earth around the roots, and evergreens are the only exceptions. There are a few of the circumstances to be well considered by every one who plants a tree.

Cutting and cutting back, must only be done, but well. It is next to漫auder to cut and dash the branches of a tree with an old rusty sawed jackknife. It is mending than tree-slaughter. A pruning knife should be as sharp and smooth as the edge on a razor. When a branch is to be wholly removed it should be done smoothly, close to the trunk or limb in which it grows. If a limb is merely to be shortened, it should be cut close to a good plump and healthy branch, that promises to make a vigorous shoot.

Wires Woven on Fences.—A week or two ago we received the news adopted by Mr. Field, on his farm in this town, of weaving wire for fastening his stone and board fence, instead of common wires.

In conversation with him the other day, upon this subject, he informed us that they do first rate, for that purpose. He was careful to obtain the toughest kind of wire that he could find. The wire he uses is No. 13. A piece of wire sufficient for a wire cost a third of a cent, or three for a cent.

The mode of making the fence is, after laying along his borders, to drive down its stakes—two at each end of the fence. A piece of rope is then laid at the bottom of the stakes on which the stone and board posts, to raise it from the ground, when put between the stakes, a suitable distance above the ground, and the stones are then laid on them, and the stones are packed up to hold it in place. This will be more than enough to make a fence of stones. If the ground is clayey, and the stones are packed up by the field, a cap or two on their top, in the winter, will suffice to hold them in place. The wire is woven in a much stronger than the common wire, which will stand, but over a year.
