From the Germantown Telegraph. Pasture—Their Management. The value of a good pasture cannot be too highly appreciated.

In order to have a good pasture, it is necessary that the soil be managed with such care, as our tillage lands which are required to produce corn or wheat.

Altrivants pastures and tillage appears to me to be the most economical method. By dividing the farm into fields of convenient size, this system is easily pursued.

It is not that this method can be adopted on all farms, for there are some where a portion of the land is unimprovable by ordinary means.

It sometimes happens that a certain portion of a farm from its peculiar location, is set apart for the purpose. This may be judicious, and whenever circumstances necessitate such an application of a portion of the household, it is a prudent and the most liberal effort to render it a profitable appendage.

It is also the practice in some sections of the country, to sow rye to feed of fowls. When this method is adopted, the land is generally inverted in the last of summer, and autumnal rye sown with grain seed.

A PRACTICAL FARMER. TANNING APPLE CASKS.—Farmers who own large orchards, usually find it convenient to procure during the middle of winter.

A better way is to begin early, when the trees are yet comparatively young, and on the trees to be used for casks, to put on a coat of white lead.

Many discover, after years of neglect, that their trees have become decayed, rotted and overgrown, and to remedy the defect, the saw and axe are necessarily applied.
