

THE WINANS NEW-MODEL STEAMSHIP... The launch of the steamer, Building by Messrs. Ross and Thomas Winans, near the Ferry Bar, was steadily progressive throughout yesterday, and she was moved on her ways about one hundred feet, the wheel-house being, when work was suspended last evening, submerged into the water. The vessel lying sideways to the water, the mode of launching is similar to the "Leviathan", on a smaller scale, but is nevertheless a very tedious undertaking, being slowly worked down by screws, which at the same time hold her back so as to prevent one end moving faster than the other. The work of launching will be resumed this morning, and the vessel will doubtless be afloat by 10 o'clock. Her long, tapering, cigar-shaped appearance when on the ways, looks still more novel as she becomes more and more erect, and her length, one hundred and eighty feet, shows to more advantage. Her trial trip, which can scarcely take place in less than two months after the launch, will be looked for with great interest.

The form of this vessel is so different from any that has been constructed, that it is a difficult matter to attempt to describe its peculiarities. With the understanding to commence with that the vessel, as she stands on the stocks, precisely the shape of a good hawser, sharp at both ends, and one hundred and eighty feet long, and sixteen feet in diameter in the centre, unbroken in continuity, except by the wheel-house, which passes around about six feet of its entire centre, above and below the water line, and the top as well as under the bottom of the vessel, the following description may be understandable:

Take two elongated and sharp pointed sugar loaves, and place them butt ends to gether, put a stick through the centre of the two butt ends, which imagine to be the shaft of the water wheel, which passes into two sugar loaves, and is driven by engines at each end of the shaft. Thus it will be seen that it is two entirely separate vessels, united only by the shaft of the water wheel and by the wheel-house, which is built completely around the vessel, extending about three feet above the water line, and raised about three feet, with open sides below the water line; for the water to pass through, and connected with the vessel by upright plates of boiler iron.

Having got thus far, imagine the hub of the wheel which is to be placed on the shaft between the two sugar loaves, to be exactly the size of the loaves, with twelve iron flanges or screws, fastened at equal distances on the outer edge of it. It will thus be seen that the wheel forms the centre of the body of the vessel, and revolves transversely, the twelve flanges on the edge of it being the propelling power. When in the water, with her engines, quick and freight, one-half of the flanges on the wheel will be all the time in the water, with twenty revolutions per minute, some idea of its propelling power may be imagined. The vessel has no deck, but on the upper segment of the tubular surface there are gang ways to pass down into the two sections, surrounded by iron railings, which extend on either side about thirty feet from the centre. With the exception of the two smoke pipes and ventilators, and the two outer works that will be visible—Baltimore Amer. Oct. 6.

Dr. Bellamy—New England used to be full of traditions of the old sayings of Dr. Bellamy, one of the most powerful theologians and preachers of his time. One or two sayings circulated about as in our childhood. For example, when one had built a fire of green wood, he exclaimed: "Warm me here! I'd as soon try to warm me by the sunlight on the north side of a tomb stone!"

Speaking of the chapel bell on Yale College, the said: "It is about as good a bell as a far cap with a shawl's tail in it."

A young man, who made himself conspicuous for a severe and denunciatory style of preaching, came to him one day to inquire why he did not have more success— "Why, man," said the doctor, "can't you take a lesson of the fisherman? How do you go to work if you want to catch a trout? You get a little hook and a line, you bait it carefully and throw it in as gently as possible, and then you sit and wait, and humor your fish till you can get him ashore. Now then, you get a great cod-hook and rope line, and trash it into the water, and haul out 'Bite or be damned!'"

The doctor himself gained such a reputation as an expert fisherman, that some of his parishioners, like experienced old trouts, played shy of his hook, though never so skillfully baited. "Why, Mr. A.," said he to an old farmer in his neighborhood, "tell me you are an Athlete. Don't you believe in the being of God?" "No," said the man. "But Mr. A., let's look into this. You believe that the world around us exists from some cause?" "No, I don't." "Well, then, at any rate, you believe in your own existence?" "No, I don't." "What! not believe that you exist yourself?" "I tell you what, doctor," said the man, "I ain't going to be twisted up by any of your theologians, and I tell you I don't believe anything—and I ain't going to believe anything!"
