A highly-respected and miccessful downtown merchant, satisfied with his profits in business for the day, and lured by the pleas enthese of the weather, inside up his moud to treat himself to a little relaxation from the cares and anxieties of his counting room, and Sur rise lis wife at the same time, by taking a side in the subusts. The accordingly procured what he con-bi-red to be a splendid stepth, and repaired with it to his handsome stad proceeding to the parlor, where he expectted to find his wife, he was somewhat astonished at finding the door locked. Hearing do not speak encouragingly as to Eishop Port-voices in the room, he rapped at the door, but er's health. His disease, starting from the no one came to open it. He continued to rap for some minutes, until finally the door was doesed by his wife, with a face as red as a peony, and her dress considerably di-ordered. The fact that he had been kept-waiting at the door and the appearance of his wife caused I im to inquire if her what the matter was. Her reply was, that she had been firing doughnuts over a hot fire, and was not expecting him home. Instead of smelling the fragrance of the doughnuts, the husband thought he smelt something else, and was about entering the parior to inside a further examination, when his wife gently pushed him back and requested him to go up stairs to her chamber for a bonnet and a cloak. Of course this unreasonable request at such a moment, was refused, and the surprotous husband pushed his wife one side and entered the parlor. The parlor was empty, and the husband was on the point of believing that It's suspicion was groundless, when he opened the door leading into a small aute-room and there beheld a rary large biforcated "doughnut" of the masculine species, and in the shape of a full grown man. This was a "nut" that he could not swallow. It choked him with rage, and he rushled upon the young man with a determination to terminate hi existence in the shortest po sible time that an angry man can kill an enemy. Imagine the injured busband's feelings, the recoil of his bulled rage, when the seducer of his wife coolly drew a pistol from lis pocket and pointing it at the husband's head, said, 'I came epared for you." Further demonstrations of violence on the part of the husband were useless, although he had been wounded at the discovery of Lis wife's perfilly, he did not wish to have a leaden bullet perforate his anatomy. He therefore allowed the seducer to depart unharmed, and then ordered the guilty wife to pact up such articles as be-longed to her, and with them leave his house forever. The discovered adultress obeyed the offier, and with many sobs and team parted from her husband and her doughnuts, and repaired to her father's house. Thus ended the merchant's rice that he was to take, and here ends our story.

As this read will soon become famous as the route of the l'rench army into Italy, the following description given by a correspondent of the New York Times, who recently passed over it, will be read with inter s The road over Monet-C. his is macadamized throughout its whole extent, and is wide and feet order, coasisting of easy grades. On the top of the mountain there was much snow but most of it was removed from the road -- a work of great labor, as the cuts in some places were ten feet deep, and the snow so compact that its sides were perpendicular. The diligence was several hours in passing hard on the west side of the meantain, and it was feared that the passage of troops was impeded by fresh shows. The journey over the pass is no pleasant affair, even to one who occurred the protected reats of a comfortable diligence-such was my fortunate positionwhat must it be to soldiers on foot, with severe rains, and incumbered with knapsacks

The pass is 0,825 feet high—n arry 300 feet higher than the famous Simplon pass. That of the great St. Bernard, over which Napoleon conducted his army before any road had been formed, is 8,200 feet. I walked for miles over the road, in the ascent from the Sardin an side, and ca efully ofserved its construction. The engineering difficulties were immense, but they had been overcome with such skill, that the ascent is uniform and easy in every part. Occasionally a level place is left to afford relief to the fiorses from the wearrsomeness of the steady pull. I noticed that the marks of the drill used in blasting were nearly obliterated, the effect of long continued exposure to severe atores, and the character of the rock, which is a roll line-stone. It may be if the history of the road shall ever be lost, that future ant quarians may contend from the obliteration of all signs of blasting, that at least no great difficulties were encountered in its construcformed on a natural best. Being in the circulation, it pervades the whole body, and may hunt out in disease on any part of it. No organ is free from its attacks, nor is there one which it may not destroy.
