under military control and discipline, that they watched for opportunities to escape. On Saturday morning last, a rumor pre-vailed around Hilton Head that the famous negro brigade would be disbanded that afternoon. The rumor of the disbandment proved correct; for Gen. Hunter had despatched an Adjutant and several officers to Elliott's plantation, where the brigade was in camp. On the arrival of these officers their purpose soon spread through the camp—creating the wildest joy among the "soldiers." The fragmentary remnant of the brigade soon fell into line, and were officially disbanded. They were delighted, but not more so the white troops.
