

The Gas Wells of Pennsylvania.

Hon. Neal Dow communicates to the Boston Congregationalist the following account of natural gas wells:

In many parts of the Keystone State, wells, bored for the purpose, yield an abundant flow of illuminating gas identical in character with that manufactured in our cities from bituminous coal.

At Erie, I saw several of these gas wells employed in this way. Directly on the shore of the lake are located the works for the supply of the city with water.

These gas wells are found also in operation in the house at my present residence. In the library was an open fireplace, and a wood fire—or what seemed to be such—for the terra cotta upon the andirons was an admirable imitation of hickory wood.

The well in the back yard, sufficient to remove from the mansion, and to be conveyed to a small house. This bore is five hundred and twenty feet deep, lined with iron pipe, and furnished with a safety valve, like that of a steam boiler, and the gas is brought into the house and conducted over it, in the same mode employed in the case of ordinary street gas or water.

Somebody who has been "studying our weights," reports that upon an average boys at a birth weigh a little more than a girl, and a little less than six pounds at half.

A prominent clergyman of Boston, in speaking of salaries, says that he received for his first year in the ministry, but seventy-five cents.

It cost Barney Aaron forty-five dollars to telegraph to his sisters in Europe that he wasn't hanged.

A Milwaukee woman, whose husband had been presented to death by a creditor, married the creditor and persuaded him to death in less than six months. Time sets all things even.

A fashionable woman in Paris, said to a reporter, "I do not object to your speaking of me in the paper, but do as my maid arranges my decolleté; dress show a little and leaves the rest for imagination."

Beauty is not to be measured as a type of heaven's unapproachable height. Where all perfection makes the sense of bliss.
