Considered in the light of subsequent events, by men occupying the positions to which Mr. Laporte now aspires, he may say that the sum he then voted to himself was so very small compared with the back-pay steal of the last Congress that it is scarcely worth mention at a period so remote from its consummation, but we do not believe that length of time is a valid excuse for wrong doing-while perhaps repentance may serve as practical extenuation for an abatement of sentence. Eight years from the time Mr. Laporte committed the above mistake the party sent him to Harrisburg again, and all there is noteworthy in his career at that time, is the fact of his voting against Simon Cameron for senator, when to have voted for him, would have done neither Cameron any good, or Laporte any harm. But so much more difficult it is to forgive a crime committed against party, than a mere "mistake" in pocketing public money that twelve years have been allowed to pass since this man's name again appears upon a banner somewhat rent by internecine strife.
