Poet's Corner.

THOSE DAYS GONE BY.
BY T. E.
Oh speak that word again,
Repeat while thro' art night,
That word which brings to memory back
The blissful scenes gone by—
The days of early youth,
When natural love was ours;
When heart to heart we pledged in truth,
In love's hope-gilded bowers.

When, in our cottage home,
The moments seemed to fly
With lightning speed, as meteor bright,
In those dear days gone by;
When wand'ring through each vale,
And wildwood's tangled maze,
We lived the dream of early love,
In those now by-gone days.

As memory now fits back
A tear drop dims mine eye,
To think that now, alas! for aye,
Those bright days have gone by;
Then speak that word once more,
With all the warmth of truth,
In all their beauty they recall
The sun-lit hour of youth.

Select Story.
AN ADVENTURE WITH PIRATES.
I knew I had wounded the deer; for I could see his blood upon the bushes through which it had rushed after receiving the shot. I thought of going back for my horse before pursuing it. I had left him tied to a tree some two or three hundred yards back, the better to approach the game. While hesitating, I noticed clear sky through the timber on three sides—right, left and in front. This could be caused only by the river, as the whole bottom land was covered with a thick cottonwood forest. It must be a bend in the stream, forming a sort of peninsula, with an isthmus of not more than a hundred yards in width, my position being about midway between the curvings of the river. In this case the buck would be in a trap, and could not get back into the bottom-land without passing me within shot. His only alternative would be to take to the water, which he might do, or might not. As it was the broad Mississippi, he likely would not; but, in any case, the horse would be of no use there; and hastily reloading, I walked on.

I had no difficulty in taking up the trail of the stricken animal. Under the shadow of the moss-trilled trees, the soil was damp, and the "shot" was conspicuous—the more so, that the antlered monarch of the forest evidently had been laboring his flight. Once again I saw gouts of blood upon the palmettos, brushed off from his bleeding flanks, as he ran through them.

I soon reached the edge of the river, and there saw his landmarks in the mud that selvedged the sloping bank. There were no return tracks; therefore he had taken to the river. It was the Mississippi, as I have said, but not the main stream. At a glance, I saw it was a "cut-off"—a small, wooded island interposing itself between me and the great "Father of Waters." Beyond doubt the deer had swam off to the island, there, equally beyond doubt, I supposed, to lie down and die.

He was a splendid buck, with not less than a dozen "times" upon his antlers. I had noticed this while drawing a bead upon him. I wanted him for a trophy, and was determined to have him. But how? The branch stream, though not over a hundred yards in width, was of rapid turbulent current. Stripped, I could swim it, though not comfortably, or carry a dry gun—certainly not to bring back with me the carcass of a large deer. The horns, perhaps I might. Better the trophy than nothing.

I had half made up my mind to strip and swim to the island, when I behought me of a boat, though of a little hope of there being any near.

Along the river for miles there was no habitation. I had hunted there before and knew it. For all this by a sort of involuntary inspiration, I glanced interrogatively around, with my eyes sweeping whatever of water-surface was in sight.

There was a boat in sight, but it was a "flat"—a regular "broad horn," and, of course, unavailable for my purpose. It was far out in the main-stream, beyond the wooded islet, which it had already passed. As I set my eyes upon it, it was just running a jutting point below; and as its great steering ear disappeared from my sight, I could make out on the stern beneath, painted in rudely shape letters the name,

"NANCY."

The Nancy could be of no use to me; and at once dismissing her from my mind I was about to commence stripping, when a canoe, shooting round the upper end of the islet, came right down the cut-off. There were two men in it. They were in their shirt-sleeves—red shirts, at that, a good deal soiled and faded. Their features were shaded by broad-brimmed wood hats, also the worse for wear. I did not stop to scrutinize either their dress or features, but at once hailed them.

"I want to cross over to the island; will you take me?"

"What d'ye want to cross thar for?"

"I've wounded a deer—a fine buck. He has swum there. He is dying or dead before this. I want to get him."

The man who handled the paddles, caused the stroke to be suspended.

"What will ye give?" was the interrogation, promptly put.

"A dollar," I replied.

"D—n yer dollar! say two and we'll do it. You expect us to take ye back to the bank after ye've got yer buck, don't ye?"

"Certainly."

"That will take some time an' we hain't any to lose. Say two shiners, an' we'll gi' half an hour."

"Agreed; two dollars."

As I said this, I plunged my hand into the pocket of my hunting-coat, and drew forth a fistful of gold and silver coin, so as to secure them to the bargain, by showing I was able to keep my part of the stipulation.
