Delmonico's, Bryant, Meyers, and Those Who are in Doubt.

The leading fashionable saloon in New York, and indeed the leading fashionable saloon on the North American continent. is Delmonico's. It is an elegant place. Wealth stopped there, and with a lavished hand turned out its gold, and gilded and decorated the place so finely that it has become the resort of the wealthy It has become the great banqueting place of the rich. The Free Trade League of New York, with its pockets filled with British gold to be used to break down the manufacturing interests of the United States, finds the gilded saloons at Delmonico's a profitable and congenial place at which to play its arts. There, surrounded by all the luxury that a great city like New York can produce, to please the eve, to charm the ear, and satisfy the delicate palate, it holds its banquets. There men of influence, who are balf and half on the question of free trade and protection, are invited; and there, amidst the dazzling appointments of the place. surrounded by the rich and artful advo cates of free trade, they are turned to favor a policy that, if adopted by the country, cannot fail of ruining the business of the country, and bring our people to the very verge of want. It is generally believed that Trochu is the man to give order to chaotic France, if it be at all possible. We present to the reader a short sketch of the General's life, from the December number of the Phrenological Journal:

General Trochu, the President o France under the new Provisional Government, was born about the year 1815, and educated at the Military School of St. Cyr and at the Staff School. He commenced his military career by serving in Algeria, where for some years he held a position on Marshal Bugeaud's county. staff. At the time of the Crimean expedition in 1854 he served as an aide-decamp to Marshal St. Arnaud. Shortly after the death of the latter he was promoted to the rank of General, and com-
