Creely and the Money Market.

In an article on the new loan a French journal, L'Opinion Nationale, lately made an earnest appeal to all political parties in favor of the suppression of petty passions and mutual denunciations in the interest of the financial situation. As an argument in behalf of the patriotic forbearance asked for, the writer remarked that "if in consequence of the good order of the country the French Treasury could borrow from capitalists the sum needed at only one half per cent. less, the advantage to France might be reckoned in money at from two to three hundred millions. On the other hand, one sees how costly to the country might at this moment be a blundering economic law, the speech of an ambitious fool, or the pamphlet of an agitator." Though addressed to Frenchmen the appeal is not less worthy of the attention of Americans, as it is founded upon that extreme sensitiveness which is the most obvious and striking characteristic of the money market everywhere, and in which the people of the United States are almost as deeply interested as the people of France. Never before in the history of the country were we so dependent as at present upon the confidence of Europe in the credit which we have established there, it is no exaggeration to say that our financial prosperity consists; as a panic which should shake the trust there placed in our willingness to redeem our pecuniary obligations, would inevitably result in general disaster. Of course, even the least, lessening of our credit would be instantaneously felt in financial speculations more or less injurious to American business relations. Where some so immense are involved, as the Frenchman cited above shows, even the smallest and most insignificant percentage at once runs up to amounts which stirle the imagination by their mere name.

Americans, it would seem, are apt to forget or overlook a truth which they should keep steadfastly in mind. The truth is that American credit abroad is a plant of recent growth. Under Democratic rule it was a sickly shrub, and so incessantly kicked and trampled upon by those whose duty it was to care for its healthy growth, that there was no prospect or likelihood of its ever becoming a tree able to resist the storms which from time to time assailed it. Royal retainers and aristocrats of every class found exquisite pleasure in its feebleness and in helping to destroy the plant which they said and believed could not grow on Democratic soil. Happily, under Republican auspices, cherished by Republican care, it has sprung up and spread abroad until it is already a tree of renown. But it is still tender and easily hurt. Like the marvellous tree described in one of the oldest of books, "with its twigs planted in cities of merchants and its seeds planted in a good soil by great waters," it is still liable "to wither in all the leaves of its spring, even without great power or many people to pluck it up by the roots."

No; neither great power nor many people are needed to accomplish the work of destruction. Let the insignificant minority of repudiators gain control of the government by the aid, or indifference of unfaithful Republicans, and our promising tree of national credit, as if touched by an east wind, shall, like the tree referred to, "wither in the furrows where it grew." The mere fact that a majority of the people of the United States had agreed to place in their highest office a man of Mr. Greeley's reputation and character would sink the nation in the estimation of all intelligent foreigners, and would prepare them for almost any national eccentricity or aberration that might follow. Thus placed on the lookout for alarming prophecies, the rulers of the money market would not have long to wait for them. The mere suggestion of "a blundering economical law" in a President's message, "the speech of an ambitious fool," the pamphlet of an agitator of repudiation in one of its severest dignities, would, in connection with the return of the Democratic party to power, suffice to produce the most injurious effects upon our financial condition.

That such fears are not utterly groundless is sufficiently attested by the fact that they are almost universally entertained by the moneyed men of the country—a class as little subject to illusions as any people in the world. If, however, there were none of the class free from these apprehensions, such unanimity would be miraculous; there were bankers in Paris who wished to see the Commune established, and there are said to be A. T. Stewart's who are content to see Greeley President. An explanation may be easily found in those compensations which reconcile individuals to changes alarming to the mass.—North American.

The story is told of Ben Butler's earlier days that a Yankee obtained his legal opinion how to recover the value of a ham which a neighbor's dog came along and ate. He was advised to prosecute and recover for damages. "But the dog was yours," said the sharp Yankee. Butler opened his eyes a little, asked him what his ham was worth, was told $5, paid the money, and then demanded a $10 fee of the astonished native for legal advice.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this: that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.
