While his train descends through the darken'd air To his realms beyond the ocean.

'Mid the tempest's wonders peering. He comes apace, while his blighting breath Is felt o'er the blanched leaves sweeping, While shivering forms from his touch of death

Schold him rise o'er the bounding waves,

To the ingle-side are creeping. How the shrivelled leaves by the passing gale From the oak's proud boughs are hurried; How the falling flowers all black and pale Are under the bent shrubs hurried!

And the minstrels sweet of the moon's gay l Have ceased their enchanting numbers, While the cheerful sound of the mountain stream Is hushed 'neath their icy slumbers. By the shivering blast and its mournful tone Through the glens and drear wood howling,

On the verge of our clime is prowling. He journeys apace through the darken'd skies, The clouds with his cold breath rending; Behold him wreathed in his frost-bound guise, And now in his might descending!
