grimage allotted to him, we are constantly present ed, for our contemplation, with two different as pects,—one, the seeming or simulated,—the other, the real or true

We behold seeming or simulated piety and religion, and behold real or true piety and, priling and philosophy; we behold seeming or simulated learning and philosophy; we behold seeming or simulated trail or true virtue and integrity; and we behold real or true virtue and integrity; we behold seeming or simulated with the description of the delivered particism, and public spirit, and trail or true enjoyment and happiness, and we behold read or true virtue enjoyment and happiness, we behold seeming or simulated particism, and public spirit, and courage, and generosity, and honor, and friendship, and love, and we behold all these qualities in existence, in reality and in truth. In fact, whenever in our intercourse with our fellow men, we meet with any thing that is real or true, and which meits or receives general approbation and respect, we may, with very great certainty, and point out the only certain and faithful guide.

I know of no grand division of the globe, nor of any subordinate division,—I know of no nation nor district, no people nor community, no rank I know of no grand division of the globe, nor of any subordinate division,—I know of no nation for district, no people nor community, no rank nor class in society, in which each of the two aspects to which I have referred, is not exhibited to the view of the attentive observer. History, the fiving canvass on which are delineated the characters and the conduct, the deeds, the words stid the thoughts of men, presents us with no era, in the time that is past, in which, clear, distinct and well defined, are not to be traced falsehood and truth,—the seeming, and the real: And while society continuous factory conclusions. Falsehood and truth are understantly and the real in the seeming and the real have realms o'er which each of the two aspects to which I have referred, is not to the exclusion of the other. Though irreconcilably antagonistical to each other, yet they are often so intimately blended together, their text.
