And thou, sweet boy, in that dark scene, Did'st raise thy thoughts to Heaven; And call on Him who cares for thee, When closed the shades of even! Who that had seen thy pure, meek gaze, Within that gloom profound, Might not have deemed an angel there, Upon the damp, cold ground;— in angel holding converse aweet
With other spirits bright,
Is that far world of happiness,—

Who might not deem thee of that land
Where day forever reigns;
And where no care or sorrow is,
No sighs, nor griefs, nor pains?
Of such as thee, are those who dwell
In all that blissful clime,
Far from the sinful haunts of men—
Revend the verse of time

The source of truth and light?

Beyond the verge of time.

As thou thy little limbs composed,
In mortal sleep to rest—
How calmly, sweetly must have risen,

At that prayer to make thee blest! Yes, innocent and trusting one,
So helpless and so weak,
His providence was over thee
Ere thou His name couldet speak.
And why may not the stalwart frame

And why may not the stalwart frame
Of man, by griefs oppress?
As trusting lean upon His arm;
And be as truly bless?
'Tis that dark clouds of unbelief'
Obstruct the light of Heaven;
He asks not His paternal care,
Nor prays his sins forgiven.
He wees not God as thou didst see,
Anneant, inst and kind.

A parent, just and kind,—
A guardian true, who slumbers not,—
The great omniscient mind.
Thou the bright fields of rest couldst view,
Beyond this vale of tears,—
The glorious prospect ne'er is seen
Through sins, and doubts, and fears.
