The following named parsons had been previously and encouraged mankind to expert their following names the collowing names the part of the world, and encouraged mankind to expert and through the medium of a nervous system, and this system is called by the anatomist the sympathetic. It consists of number of little knot-like bodies called by the anatomist ganglia, which are extended along each aids of the vertebral column—the whole of the seganglia being connected by means of fibres, together. Now, it appears that each of these ganglia is capable of generating nervous influen e independently of the brain; hence each may be considered as a distinct nervous centre. The trunks arising from these ganglia are distributed principally to all those organs on which is vicality of the body depends, which are employed in secretion and its nutrition. It is the smedium by which all parts of the body are brought into relation with each other, so that no one part shall become diseased or injured without the rest aympathising with it, and indirectly, therefore iscoming effected as well.
