We were yesterdsy in conversation with an elderly geutleman who has lived a good life and is reaping its just leward. Another; who looked older than our friend, approached, us he was a miserable look ling object, bent down, and in rags. He appeared grateful for the recognition he received; and we think he received aid from the hand of our friend, who remarked, as the poor fellow passed on, that he had known him long. "When I was a boy," said to the race course. That man was then a youth.—He was richly dressed, and seated upon a fine and handsome caparisoned horse, while behind him rode his servant in livery, who, with his hand to his hat; endeavored to anticipate every with of his young master, and occasionally held his horse when the young gentleman entered a hoath to genture his money upon the games of chance that were conducted there. The rest of us envied him, and thought how happy we should he were we only in his position. He is now grateful for a sign of recognition from me."

Does the reader know of no suck instances as thist looked upon the graves of many poor fallen creatures who in childhood he envied? And yet how many who have it in their power to educate aright, intellectifully and religiously, the children of their love, are neglecting this, and seeking only to render them rich enough to excite the admiration or the envy of their companious in the journey of life! I had not slept long when my light drams were influenced by strange sounds. I dream that lions were rushing about in quest of me, and, the sounds increasing, I awoke with a studen start, uttering a loud shriek. I could not for several seconds remember in what part of the world I was, or chything connected with my present position. I heard the rushing of light feet as of a pack of wolves close on every side of me, accompanied by the most unearthly sounds. On raising my head, to my after horror I saw on every side nothing but eavage, wild dogs. On my right and on my left, within a lew paces of me, stood two lines of these feroclous looking solumls, cocking their cars and stretching their needs to have a look, at me, while two large troops, in which there were at least forty, kept dashing backwards and lorwards across my wind within a few yards of me, chattering and growling with the most extraordinary volubility. Another troop were fighting over the wild beast I had shot., On shoulding them I expected no other fato than to be instantly torn to pieces. I felt my blood ciriding along my checks and my hair bristling on my fead, However, I had presence of mind to consider that he human voice and a determined hearing mygnit or indeed my large blanket with both hands, at the same line addressing my savage assembly in a loud and colemn manner. This had the desired effect: the wild dogs semided to a more respectful distance, barking at me something like collies. Upon this I spatched up my rife and commenced loading, and bofore this was accomplished the entire pack had passed away.—Adventures in South Africa. Besteged by Wild Dogse A TTORNEY AT LAW.
