The Great Intellectual Tournament in [Correspondence of the Evening Post ]

PARIS, July 20th. The debate in the Legislative assembly, or the revision of the constitution, which has just closed in a vote most disastrous to the scheme of the monarchists and the personal hopes of Na poleon the Little, was one of the most brillian poteon the Little, was one of the most brillian intellectual displays that has ever taken place in France. All the great speakers of the different parties, and shades of parties, participated in the discussion; not only with a profound conviction of the importance of the occasion to the country, but with an evident and keen rivalescent for the palm of cloquence and success.

The debate began on Monday, the 14th inst. referring to it, let me explain the mode in which the purliamentary contests are conducted here.
When a time is set, apart for the consideration of any great question all, who intend to sneak of any great question—all who intend to speak upon it inscribe their names upon a list kept for the purpose,—and they speak in the order in which their names are carolled—one speaker on each side in alternation until the list is completed. It generally happens, however, that the different parties of the chamber get their crack "JAMES CAMPBELL, of Philadelphia." speakers pitted against each other so that a very profound or brilliant exhibition on one side is followed by something similar of the other. The speeches are generally brief-not made to Buncomb as with us—but addressed to the House and to the single question before it : nor yet consisting of elaborate essays on the subject in hand, with ounddenda of all the stat would be impossible to give an outline of all the remarks, but I may say briefly that the the committee, and briefly stated the objects of debate, on the part of the greater gods, was opened by De Falloux and Cavaignac—the former a devoted adherent of monarchy, and the latter as devoted a republican. It was the polioy of De Tocqueville and the other friends of tion of revision, but from the very outset it became a controversy between the republic and the monorchy. De Falloux was cool, adroit, statis-tical and apparently sincere. He urged that France, since she had rushed into the revolution-France, since she had rushed into the revolution on the Wednesday following, (August 20th.) at any agitations of 1789, had fallen behind the 11 o'clock, A. M., at the Court House, in the great monarchial countries of Europe, in all that relates to physical wealth and moral grandeur. and that the only cure for her ills was a radical

Jones the republican is the only form of government stand,) on the Steubenville road. the people. The two principles could not consequently be discussed side by side—the one was on motion of John Corre, Esq., secon a falsehood, the other a divine truth. He was H. S. Madraw, Esq., it was opposed to the revision, therefore, not that the constitution was perfect, but because the object of those who assail it was to aim a death-blow at the republic. The constitution was the first Convention on the subject of appointing dele-

The next speaker Coqueril, a popular and fascinating Unitarian clergyman, is a fine declaimer, but carries not force with him. He attempted a reply to the stern General, but soon involved himself in agreat deal of confusion. He was in favor of the Republic, because the republic man arror or the 'kepublic, because the republic was scriptural, but at the same time he was in employed the Deacon to assist him when he is favor of re-electing Prince Louis, because the "hard up!" All right, of course. Grevy was about to make a reply to this rigmarole, when, for some reason or other—ill-health probably—he broke down, and gave way to the anerges of the liberals, the indomitable Michel de Bourges. Man of the Mountain, a strong, burly, bigbrowed, unconquerable red-republican, as prepared to go down into the streets to do battle for liberty, as he is to defend accused editors at the tribunal, or to meet the chosen champion of legitimacy in the tribune. The enrnestness with which he commonly asserts his convictions, produces such interruptions from the Right, that he is not often allowed to be heard. But as both sides now had agreed to abstain from these irritating impertinences, the old war-horse was permitted to walk over the field in his own fashion. At first he was moderate in tone, disputing Cavaiguac's doctrine—that the republic was above discussion, and alleging that it courted at all times and in every place, the most But as he got warm in the work, he poured out a torrent of argument, sarcasm, defiance and patriotic appeal. When he turned, at times, his black fiery eyes towards the legitimist benches, and threatened the vongeance of the peo-ple on the heads of those who would betray their supremacy, the faces of his adversaries would turn pale with oppressed excitement and rage, and when he proclaimed the Republic of Rebruary—the republic of popular acclamation—of sincere conviction,—mighty and imperishable,—the mountain would heave like Ætna in thundering cheers. It was the great speech of the week, and the republicans instantaneously resolved to print millions of copies of it, to be sent to all parts of the provinces. The history which it gives of the political struggles of the last thirty years, will be found to be one of the most valuable narratives of the day.

The legitimists, aware of the profound effect of Michel, the next day brought their most splendid orator, Berryer, to combat his positions. It was wisely done; for no other man in France. could, for one moment, have breasted the current set in motion by the advocate of Brouges His silvery voice, his graceful manner, his vari ous culture, his ready wit, his adroit logic, his honest attachment to Monarchy, induced even the most violent of the mountain to listen to his defence of royalty, and his custigation of liber alism. He replied piccemeal to the history, the argument, and the vaticinations of Michel, eliciting incessant applouse, which rang around the walls of the house. But with all his fervor and impassioned gestulation, it was evident that Berryer secretly thought the republic a forgone conclusion, and that he defended the family whose claims he maintains, with the air of forlorn and desperate hope.

If you will call to mind Scott's description or the encounter between the lithe and supple Sa ladin with his sword and scimeter, and the

ous battle axe, your will get an idea of the dis-cussion between Michel and Berryer. It was thought that it would close not the dewas yet to come. After a few different speeches, the great dramatist and poet ascended the try con have no claims upon the Democratic tion. He had scarcely begun, however, when party. He is scarcely fit to associate even with the turbulence ceased, and every eye and ear was attentive. His short epigrammatic sentenoes fell upon the audience like quick discharges of musketry—first the vivid flash of fancy, then the sharp report of logic, which drove the ball home somewhere. "Revision," he began, "is impossible, so long as the law of May disfranchises three millions of Frenchmen." Turning to Berryer, and DeFalloux, he continued they who attack the republic attack the entire revolution since 1789—the revolution of humanity, which established the best government Fifth France ever saw, and haid the foundation for the figure Libited Street of France ever saw, and haid the foundation for the figure Libited Street of France ever saw, and haid the foundation for the figure Libited Street of France ever saw, and haid the foundation for the seventh same and the sam future United States of Europe. 1789 could no more be separated from the subsequent years than you could separate the dawn from the sun The republic was the rising. Overturn it and it Tenth leaves behind it a Right—but overturn monar—Tota chy and it remains a ruin!" In this pointed style, Hugo proceeded until he had lashed the Assembly into a perfect upour. He was interrupted at every turn, and the bolts he shot into the carcase of Louis Napoleon's government must unquestionably cut off that monstrous non-descript entirely. But I am compelled abrupt.
