

LADY JANE

The incident alluded to, occurred about the beginning of the 12th century. My grandfather was generally known to the party. His father often told the story in my hearing, and I have heard it since.

The Earl of Wigton had three daughters, named Lady Frances, Oriana and Jane. A young gentleman courted her for several years, and by degrees the most beautiful. The two eldest were permitted to attend her at Edinburgh, in order that they might have a chance of obtaining her, but her superior beauty might interfere with and foil the attraction of her sisters. It may only be imagined that Lady Jane spent no pleasant life, shut up, as it were, in a splendid palace to be sure—but having no company except her old nurse and the servants. She was so very beautiful that her parents were afraid that any gentleman should be attracted by her, and so she was kept in her room, and so she was kept in her room, and so she was kept in her room.

At the period when our history opens, Lady Jane's charms, although never in Edinburgh, had begun to make some noise there. A young gentleman on day passing the garden, saw a angel picking strawberries. After getting all but her retreat under the guns of her father's castle, he learned among the cottagers near the castle, that the youngest daughter of Lord Wigton. He rode on and reported the matter in the capital, and the next day the court were taken by surprise: no one ever heard of Lord Wigton having a third daughter. This report induced Lord Wigton to confide her ladyship yet more entirely; he sent an express to his wife, requesting her to have Jane confined to the precincts of the house and garden, and also to be attended by a trusty female servant. The consequence was, that the lady complained most piteously to her mother of the want of attention to her, and wished to see her father, and she was very ugly, old, and as happy as her sisters.

Lord Wigton was not accessible to the cruelty of his policy, as he loved his beautiful daughter more than any of the others; he therefore felt anxious to alleviate, in some manner, the dreariness of her solitary confinement. Knowing her to be fond of music, he sent her by a messenger a Terzino, which she was very desirous to be able to amuse herself in a way which she could not play upon the instrument, as she had little better than an unmeaning toy. By return of the messenger, she sent a very affectionate letter to her father, thanking him for the instrument, and begged him to send some person who would teach her to play on it.

The next day on the road, she was Richard Livingston on the Road to Wigton palace. He carried a letter from her father, which she was setting forth the qualities of the young man, and hoping she would now be better contented with her present residence.

It was Lady Jane's practice every day to take a walk, preceded by her father, in the garden which she had enclosed, and she was very self-satisfied upon the report of her husband's complaint. This arrangement was exceedingly agreeable to Lady Jane, as she sometimes took her father, and she added music to their other pleasures of the walk.

However, to make a long story short, it would have been a great blessing to her, if she had been young people have escaped from falling in love. Her father, however, who was a very prudent man, and perfectly satisfied with her, knew her father, and she was within the limits prescribed by her father.

Mr. Walter Gould, an American artist, Philadelphia, writes under date of the 10th of August, in relation to the Rev. Mr. Kossuth, who is in New York, that he has had several interviews with Kossuth, and taken a portrait of him, which pleased him and his family. Gould writes that Kossuth speaks English with ease, and always eloquently, though with a defective pronunciation. He says: "I was very much interested in the interview, and was glad to see that Kossuth was so well acquainted with the English language. He spoke of his travels, and of the friends he had made in various parts of the world. He was very kind and pleasant, and I was glad to see that he was so well liked by the people of New York."
