but few, perhaps, dream that they serve any val-nable end. The following passage will prove the contrary .--Every one must have observed what are usually called the whiskers on a cat's upper lip. The use of these in a state of nature is very important. They are organs of touch. They are attached to a bed of close glands under the skin, and each of these long hairs is connected with the nerve of the lip. The slightest contact of these whiskers with any surrounding bject, is thus felt most distinctly by the animal though the hairs of themselves are insensible. They stand out in each side of the lion as well They stand out in each side of the hon as win as in the common cat; so that from point to point, they are equal to the width of the animal's body. If we imagine, therefore, a lion stealing through a covert of wood, in an imperfect light, we shall at once see the use of these long hairs. They indicate to him through the nicest feeling; any obstacle which may present itself to the passage of his body; they prevent the rus-tle of boughs and leaves, which would give warning to his prey, if he were to attempt to pass through too close a bush; and thus, in con-junction with the soft cushion of his feet, and the fur upon which he treads (the retractile claws
