on its path, but it is necessary to the physical equilibrium and purification of the air; and so is revolution necessary, when tyranny and oppression and fraud and corruption are exerting all their influences against the freedom and happiness of man. The power and goodness of God is seen and felt in the tempest; and so also should his mighty arm be recognized in the moral energies of those revolutions which change the features of history and mark the progress of humanity. The evils which attend both are partial: the good is universal.
