covered as to leave the house and renew my search for employment. I found a great change had taken place since I had kept my room. In every trade there seemed to be a new life; and in a few days I was engaged in a manufactory in the Ruc St. Denis. My employer was pleased with my work, and paid me well. My first care was to repay my friend the money which I owed her. She arranged a visit to the cure on the following Sunday, and show him her money, as she had originally intended. I offered to accom There are but few days in our lives which are not forgotten as soon as passed. The fete days in the calendar of our existence are few and far apart. Yet sometimes we come to a day which never passes from our memory till we die. Everything we thought and did upon that day omes back to us afterwards, when the eye is filmed with thought, and all the present is for gotten for awhile. This Sunday will live forever in my memory, one of the foremost of such happy days. We rose early, and went out of Paris by the Barrière de l'Etoile. It was a still, cold autumn morning. The mist that lingered still, when we set out, had wholly passed away, and left a heavy dew upon the leaves, and laid the dust upon the roads. We turned off from the highway after awhile, and took a footpath across the meadows till we came to a deep valley, and ood still to look around us for a time. Behind us we saw the towers and triumphal arches of the white houses of the outskirts sprinked, far and wide, among the trees. But below t was a quiet landscape. One side of the valley was ploughed up to the borders of a wood. In the hollow stood the old church where we were going, ivy-squared, with a square tower. Behind flowed the Seine, and, farther still, the forest, called the Bois de Boulogne, piled up into the sky its masses of innumerable tints. We descended and entered the church. We were late, for we had lingered long to look upon that scene. My friend touched the incense-brush which was presented to ber at the door, but I did not. There was chaunting as we entered; but presently the cure mounted the pulpit and began to preach. He was a fine old man. His hair was grey, but he was not bald. His face a somewhat careworn expression, and his fore-head was planted deep with wrinkles. I listened with delight to his discourse, which seemed to harmonise with the mood wrought in my mind by the calm autumnal day, and the sight of that still country; for he preached not of dogmas, or of articles of faith, but of charity and love to all makind.

We waited for him in the churchyard, and when the whole of the congregation had left the church, and the footpaths were dotted with them in their next attire, the cure issued from the door, and the sexton fastened the great bolts behind him. Aimee ran to meet him, and he kissed her on the forehead, and turning towards me, said, "So yon have found a new friend."

The romarks might appear with perfect propriety in a paper hearing the significant name of the suston fastenee, "say, rather, that it assess wonder to find it in the fair printed pales of music, equal to it. "Th She looked confused; but the cure patted her and tell him how this was. He walked between us in his silken gown, tied with a girdle at the waist, and with his head uncovered, while I re-lated to him all my story. She hung down her her on the forehead once again. And he begged us to come home and dine with him with so much earnestness that we complied. I half-guessed his reason. He had eyed me at first with the anxiety with which a father scrutinises the lover of his child, and he wished to have me longer in silence, listening to our words. The dis-course of the old man was full afdeep and practhat had grown weary in seeking, in the eternal ebb and flaw of history, the tendency of life, and had fallen back upon the present, and a good and holy life, as the only certain things which man can hold. In the evening he accompanied us back to the church, where we left him, and took our way homewards. We looked back one of the most distinguished Cabinets that again from the hill top, and saw the sun about to sink into the forest, and a level shaft of light shot across all that golden sea of leaves. It was shot across all that goiden sea or leaves. It was dusk when we returned. A few days afterwards and reproach has never since been raised against she received a letter from the old man, as she him in a vituperative manner, until the Review spoke favorably of me, amongst other things, but cantioned her to avoid, not only evil but the appearance of evil, so that she might escape the scandal of the world. The church was too far for her to visit regularly. But after she had been to mass, we went together every Sunday to St. Cloud or Asnieres, or some other village in the environs. The fine weather lingered still. The trees under our window were nearly bare, and the vine against the house had begun to shed its stalks, but in the country the trees were still thick with leaves, for there had been no wind. The mornings became more misty, but at mid-day the sun was warm. It seemed the winter would never come such a golden calm had fallen on the earth; till one morning, while we talked still of country rambles, I looked out of my ndew and saw the snow flakes falling in the street. Then came the winter nights, and how to pass them? We could sip no longer our cofthe on the Boulevards, sitting at the little green table under the trees. Sometimes we played at chess, which I had taught her, and twice we went to the theatre together. But this was not enough. One day I asked her if she would like to learn English, and she said "Yes"

The master selected me to superintend months. The master selected meto superintend them. The choice was a mark of confidence, and I could not refuse to go. I told my friend of it in the evening. I was to leave Paris on the Monday following, and the day previously, we arranged to visit the old cure once again.

Yet another day, which will linger in my memory till I die!—the brightest of those happy days! We want out earlier this time. It was the first of June—a fine clear morning. 'Again, the Union is formed upon the basis of equal rights among all the States. Courts of Admiralty have been found necessary in all com-mercial countries, not only for the safety and convenience of commerce and the speedy decision of controversies, where delay would often be rain: but also to administer the laws of notion in a season of war, and to determine the valid-ity of captures and questions of prize or no prize in a judicial proceeding. And it would be con-trary to the first principles on which the Union was formed to confine these rights to the States bordering on the Atlantic, and to the tide water rivers connected with it, and to deny them to the citizens who border on the Lakes, and the great navigable streams which flow through the Western States. Certainly such was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution: and if such be the construction finally given to it by this Court, it must necessarily produce great public inconvenience, and at the same time fail accomplish one of the great objects of the of the Constitution: that is—a perfect equality in the rights and the privileges of the officens of the different States, not only in the laws of the general government but in the mode of which came upon her while alone in her own exist, if the commerce on the lakes and on the navigable waters of the West, are denied the benefits of the same courts and the same jurisdiction for its protection, which the Constitu-tion secures to the States bordering on the At-"The only objection made to this jurisdiction
