MRS. BOSTWICK'S CONCERT. The Concert of Mrs. Bostwick, last night, was occupying the volume, has never before been pubrespectably attended, though by no means as lished. The argument of this poem is in oppo- Custom Receipts, well as the sterling merits of the performances sition to the views of those reformers "who deserved. We have not time nor space to go into a lengthy notice of the different pieces. Of Mrs. Bostwick we will say, that she possesses a pure seprane voice of great sweetness and surprising flexibility, and at the same time of considerable power. Her pieces were well selected and enabled her to display great versatility of talent. The Ballads were prettily and tastefully rendered, whilst performance o the more elaborated pieces displayed great artistic skill. The sacred Brayura "Grafias agimus tibl," with Seide's flute accompaniment was perhaps the gem of the evening; the vocal and instrumental, blending so completely as almost -: to destroy the identity of each. We have heard

Madame Bishop several times in the same piece but her performance did not, in our opinion come up to the standard of our American prima donna, Mrs. Bostwick. One of whose chief excellencies is the extreme nentness with which everything is rendered. The violin pieces of Mr. Appy, were most difficult and complicated, and their performance elicited the unqualified applause always accorded to a superior artist .-Of the merits of Mr. Seide we need scarcely speak, as he is already known to our citizens and is an established favorite throughout the country. We are glad to learn that one mor concert will be given on Friday evening next, when our citizens will have another opportunity of hearing this singularly gifted troupe. THE EDITOR of the Washington Union has been much enquired after of late, and many want to know who is "Gen. Armstrong?" The following letter from "Old Hickory" will, perhaps, enlighten them:

LEDENPIION FROM LABOR, AND OTHER POEMS By Charles P. Shiras. Pittsburgh: Publishe by W. H. Whitney, Third street, 1852. This volume of Poems, to say the least, was looked for with considerable interest, by our citizens; not only from the fact of Mr. Shiras being a native said for a long time a resident of his city, but also from the fact that his past success as an author and poet had led his friends to aticipate for him greater success when he should enter a more enlarged field of literary labor. In the triumph of Mr. Shiras our citizens will feel a just pride-here he is well known. and his talents, learning, and genius have never been doubted. "Redemption from Labor" is a poem of considerable length, and unlike most of the others

The following extract presents a truthful, though not a brilliant picture. If the poet has Segar, is indicative of a determination not succeeded in presenting an earthly paradiae, teeming with all that is lovely, he at least has succeeded in portraying the great manufacturing ful picture of the Iron City:

The city lay upon a pointed valley, That held spart two broad and noble rivers, Whose waters met beyond the sloping wharves And mingled into one; but, as no glare Of day revealed these things, he looked above And saw a cloud of dark and sulphurous smoke, Rolling and lifting, as it passed away.
Upon the southern process, but not diminished. For, underposth, a thousand rearing furnaces Poured forth, from chimnles that stood up Like ancient monuments, their dull black str That served to feed the moving sea of darkness.

Beneath this cloud were half revealed the form Of blackened dwellings ranged on gloomy streets, The which, partaking not of that great life That moved in turmoll and confusion round them, Seemed like the plies of Herculeneum New-risen from their long forgotten tomb!

On every side were workshops, foundries, mills And glaring furnaces; round these appeared The tolling throng that hurried to and fro. Or dragged, with hooks, great bars of heated fron. While to the wandering stranger's eye they see Black as their dwellings, as their mighty engines Resiless and tireless!

A strange and minuled noise of balching steam Of clattering hammers, from freighted cars, And vessels shricking on the troubled rivers Amid a cesseless, changeless roar that came From all the city, like that fearful voice With which the ocean speaks when challed and

In the business of registering he employs several clerks. Applications for new banks are daily being made, and no man can tell where the end is to be. In this mania for free banks and more paper cur-rency, a new feature is manifested. Heretofore, the marts of trade and commerce have been selected as the location for banks, but under the new system of banking on bonds, this principle has been reversed. The out of the way and retired villages, far from the seat of trade and business, are selected.
