FROM ALBERIO THE SECOND. POR THE DAILY MOBNING POST-BY W. J. T.

During the following weeks Louis Nerse twelve times presented himself at the house of the beautiful widow and deposited twelve cards without having the satisfaction of being once received. Madame Duhamel was either invisible or she had gone out. Upon the day when he left his twelfth card, in spite of his good breeding, he let slip a stunning oath inside of his moustache, as he was descending the well worn stairs

"She is positively determined,-" said be sort to all the tricks of the stage. I am madly in love with Madame Duhamel; she is necessary, -she is indispensable to the happiness of my existence. She shall be my wife or I will avenge myself cruelly upon Follette, her only passion." Scarcely had he pronounced these canicidal words when tapping his forehead and rubbing his hands gleefully, he exclaimed. "I have it! I've hit upon the plan. The vic-

He skipped behind some blooks of stone belenging to a new building in progress of construction, near by, and waited for the exit of Madame Duhamul. Half an hour had passed when the pretty widow appeared, followed, as usual, by her faithful spaniel. She directed her steps toware the Tuileries and sealed herself at the edge of the grand avenue with her back way down the Rue Ville d' Eveque towards the to call; and organized with Charles Barnett in the ries. Nerac had gone into the store of a and W. J. Rose acting as Socretary. grocer and had provided himself with a large lump of sugar and a ball of twine. Concealed behind the box of the orange tree, invisible to the eyes of Madame Duhamel, who was absorbed in the execution of some elegant needle work, he unwound his twine to the extremity of which was attached the tempting eaccharine.— Fatal saure! Scarcely had Follettee perceived this unlooked for prey when she darted upon it like an arrow; but, still more rapid than Follette, Nerac jerked the cord and the sugar leaped ion paces away. This manœuvre skillfully renewed, conducted her in three bounds to the adjoining terrace. The railing was but two steps farther. A hack was standing close to the n the Rue Ville d' Eveque. One morning, and this time, bold as a lion, Louis Nerac presented himself at Madame Du hamel's door. He held Follette in a leash, Fol lette who danced about and wagged her tail with delighf as she recognized the place where she had lived, the scenes of her petted birth. "Follette! Why here's Follette," exclaimed the Madame Duhamel came running out and the noment she perceived Nerno was seized with an emotion which did not escape the keen eyes of "You here, Monsieur?" she exclaimed "and is it you who brings me back my dear little "The same, Madame," it is I who have just pursuit of her,' ' said the lover, never wincing under the enormity of his fulsehood "Two hundred leagues?" repeated the widow "Two hundred and forty, if I count aright," replied Nerac "since the guide-book informs me that Angouleme is one hundred and twenty leagues from Paris." How! was she then at Angouleme?" "Yes Madame! attracted by the rare delicacy of her form a conducter of the diligences run-ning from Paris to Bordeaux took possession of Pollette, made off with her and lost her in the pretty town I mentioned, where I have been fortunate enough to recover her." "But, Monsieur," murmered the young w man, "you must have spent a great deal of money?" "Oh! a trifle, scarcely a hundred dollars."

Believe me, Madame, that I do not make a profession of hunting stray dogs and that the ed and proved so beneficial beyond all expectation, question of reward has not engaged my attention, that it has since been delivered in other cities ion in this affair.

"In my turn, Madame, I will repeat to you the words addressed to me last month: "It is impossible for me to hear you farther." I should but be too perience, nungent and effective rebuke against well paid if you would only permit me to call from time to time to present to you my most respectful homage." A propos," asked the young woman "your · Heaven has listened to the prayer which you put up in my favor: it has blessed me, and, here I have not sneezed for two weeks past." From this moment forth, without, however, figuring as yet among the intimate intention house, Louis Nerac was admitted by the young house, Louis Nerac was admitted by the young widow. What an amount of amiability straw-colored gloves, smiles and new cl delicate attentions and varnished boots be displayed may be imagined but not told. One day noticed that the portrait of the defunct was no longer in its usual place. From the private room, it had been transferred with its craps to the parlor. This apparently simple detail of ably accommodate the large audiences that are mained there until the Amazonia came down, "my hero" as I would willingly call him were it not that so majestic ixe may be a little too solemn for story as devoid of academic pretensions as

However, his undertaking did not advance very rapidly. Well, getting along slowly in love is as if you were falling behind. Veni, Vidi, Vici, is the true device of conquerors and lovers. The last of June was near at hand; already had the aunt of Madame Duhamel departed for the country, preceding her niece by a few days only and Nerac who had not been invited company them. Nerac threatened with separation of several months from the pretty widow, was enduring a thousand tortures "She shall not go!" said he. "She must not go! But, how the deuce to keep her here?" Upon the evening preceding the day fixed for the journey, Follette again disappeared. Advertisements and handbills were once more put in circulation, but this time without result.— Madame Duhamel wept sincere tears for her spaniel, as she would have wept the death of a lear friend. Nerac, who was incited to trot about the city like a letter carrier, came back every evening to narrate his fruitless efforts o the day. Oh, power of love! the scamp even drew from his lachrymal glands some hypocritical tears which greatly moved the fair sufferer. During the occurrence of these events, the portrait of the late Duhamel passed from the parlor to the dining room, and Mariette disrobed t of its funeral crape.

At length, persuaded that Follette was torn from her forever, Madame Duhamel recommened her preparation for departure. "Wait a little longer," said Nerac to he "Why wait?" ske asked; "poor Follette, she is dead, or if she still be alive, I shall never see her more."

"Who knows?" "What signifies this mysterious tone? Have in the steamer Empire City, for Havana, in the you any news of her?

Monsieur Nerac, you are concealing something from me. In the name of that friendship unites us, speak, I beg you?" tors her to you alive, I do not despair of being health, and rejuvenated all over. Col. M'Cann-"No, painted."
"By whom?"

"So, you can paint then."
"Oh! a little."

"And you will have it finished?"
"In two months."
"That's a long time." "But, you must observe, Madame, that I am not the most expert painter in the world, and I have to work without a model. My time is wasted in effacing what I have already done and n daubing it over again to efface it afresh." Upon the day when the astute Nerse brought to the pretty widow the image of her spaniel, a Deforges, the portrait of the late Duhamel passed from the dining room to the ante-room.

The winding up of the story has I suppose, been already divined; instead of joining her of the Lake Superior Copper Companies, Liave slways looke the Lake Superior Copper Companies, Liave slways looked the Lake Superior Copper Companies and Liave slways looked the Lake Superior Copper Copper Copper Copper Copper Copper Copper Copper C aunt in the country, Madame Duhamel wrote to her to return. MISSES. EDITORS:—Being accustomed to read your valuable paper, and being also interested in the stocks of soveral of the Lake Superior Copper Companies, Lhave always looked with interest to your quotations, as to their value in your city. I notice great discrepancies between the reports in your paper and in those of the Gazotte. In some cases the price acked in your paper is one or two dellars per abare different from the quotations in the Gazette. Which is right? For are the quotations of value, in both papers, a sort of standing advertisement, not to be regarded as any evidence of the actual value? If so, would it not be well to leave out quotations entirely—lest the readers of the Pittsburgh papers might be unintentionally misled.

The mining interests, in the Lake Superior region, are now being looked to with much interest in this quarter; and Pittsburgh is known to be the point where the short accurate information should be sought.

I have no other object in writing this, but to call your attention to this particular department of your paper, knowing the interests of many in having correct information from your city.

part of Mr. Ewbank. The editor of the Tribune pronounces these charges false, and says the real reason of his removal was, "Because he would not consent to lavish the Public Money in his charge on a personal favorite of the President, in violation of law." This is certainly one of the heaviest charges ever brought against a President of the United States, and if the Tribune does not give a false coloring to the facts which it adduces in evidence, there is a bad look for President Fillmore.—Nat.
