Deep stream, dark stream, flowing through the wood. Pure stream, sweet stream, gliding soft and slow: Like a steeping infant's bosom. Heaving deep and low. Heaving deep and low.
Glowing here a thousand flowers
Stoop to kiss thy placid brow.
And blush to see themselves reflected
In thy liquid depths below!
Overhead the giant torest
Shutting out the heat of day,
Bowing to thy graceful numbers
With the laughling Breezes play!

Ewilt stream, broad stream, stawing down the hill tide, Gay afream, while stream ruching quickly by;
Langhing like a restless school boy
Set at liberty!
Bounding onward like a courser.
With the foam upon his plank;
Outckly emarching stolen kisses
From the billies or the bank!
Rippling over the schining pebbles.
See the dimpled streamlest play;
Whitling round in circling eddia.
Then down the hill away!

Pown toward you distant clade. See the crasy streamler rushing. Bee you dark and high cascade. Now it leaps from rock to rock: With a deep and stunding shock; While the deafening colous mock.

While the deafening echoes mees.
Each other far awa!
Rushing, grashing, hissing, flying
Laughing, singing, grouning, sighing
Life a waxward infact crying—
See it dashing into spray!
Trickling from a thousand places,
Like a thousand silver laces;
And milly running ross. And gally running races

And the lady Hildegord blushed; and Graf Max von Steinrad put his arms about her, and their lips were pressed together. So Max de-

Now this happened the very day before our history opens. And on the morrow, Hildegard donned her riding-attire, and attended by her maidens, and six men-at-arms, rode gaily for Schoenberg. The sun shone; the girls prattled; the sweet brown eyes of Hildegard noted the scenery, and her heart remembered Max; and so they rode slowly along till the sun began to dealine in the heavens, and to slant his golden rays through the foliage of the woods. Then one of the troopers rode up to Hildegard, and doffing his bonnet-cap, said: "Would it please you, noble lady, to prick on a little faster? I do not think we will reach Sohoenberg before night fell." from a bush; and then there was the cramp of mailed steeds and the ring of arms, and twenty troopers headed by Katzenellenbogen, surround of the party of Hildegard. Resistance was useless, and the poor lady found herself by night-fell a prisoner in one of the intret-rooms of the fierce Baron.

and gleamed upon the swift Rhine, she, tired with weeping, sat leaning her head upon her hand by the window. She was watching the form shout the rock of the Lorelei, when she saw a light cloud rise slowly and hover above it, and then float down the river.
"Poor Lorele!" she thought; "doubtless she has suffered much to have so sad a part to play, and I at least pity her."

As she said this, she felt something brush the back of her hand, and a drop of water fell upon it. She started, but only saw the light cloud lost slowly back up the Rhine. "The dews are beginning to fall," she said, and was durning from the window, when she heard a splash in the most, and looking down.

While the Baron was still standing; they heard a cry of alarm from the sentinel, and the feudal lord sprang fourth and mounted the wall. Lo! on the other side of the wall sate Hild gard upon a snow-white palfrey, and waved her hand to him, and struck her horse with a light whip, and away like the wind. He spraug from the wall, and scross the draw-bridge; there stood a jet black charger saddled, and without a moment's thought the Baron leaped upon his back and drove the spurs into his sides. The bound of the steed was like the swoop of an eagle thundered down the hill. God; what a wild ride! plashing through marsh and brook, scrambling through thicket and rocky pass, the women and the palfrey before, the Baron behind women and the pairrey before, the bards belief on his swart steed, that snorted with fary. On up the Rhine, through startled hamlet, dark cedar wood, on past the rock of the Lorelei to the house of a boatman on the shore. Here he saw Hildegard spring from her palfrey, and into a skiff, which with one light push she sent from he shore. A few bounds brought her pursue to the same place, and in another moment he too was in a boat sweeping down the flerce ourrent of the Rhine.

With his eyes fixed upon her, he saw her approach the rock of the Lorelei, and with a light foot leap upon it. Then, she, thanked the white wreath from her head, and shook down her tresses, no longer brown, but golden as the sunlight; she tore the robe from her shoulders, and her white bosom rose, fair as the snow, and with her ivory arms she swept the golden chords of a harp and her wierd, sweet song rang into the reeling prain of the Baron.O God Paths shricked; "this the Lorelaci." And as the power of the whirlpool caught his bark he heard her ringing, unearthly laugh, and saw her mocking, pittless face. And the whirlpool had him and sucked him into its vortex, and threw his bruited corpse back to the surface, and the current cast it at the feet of the retainers up-

Thus, for her pity, did the Lorelei take the form of Hildegard, and lure the Baron to his doom. As for Hildergad, all that the marriage had accomplished was to make her inheritress of the domain and castle of Katzenellenbogen and not knowing precisely what else to do with it, she presented it to Graf Max von Steinrad
