A THRILLING STORY. Carlotta ; or the Murdered Countess.

In the early part of the month of October, o the year 1822, having passed the night at Spo-leto, which still looks as if the fatal earthquake f 1708 had shaken all the inhabitants out o eded, after breakfast, over the Torni, it, we pro isiting by the way the curious remains of an ancient aqueduct and an arch called the Arch of Hannibal, under which he is said to have passed educt and an arch called the Arch of triumph after the battle of Thrasymene. Though we had but fifteen miles to travel, yet, as we had to creep over the Appenines a great part of it, it was towards the middle of the day, when we heard our postillions crying, "Via! via!" as we drove up to the door of the hotel at Terni. An odd-looking foreign carriage that impeded our way moved forward upon this sumons, and we took its place ; and having alighted, were conducted to a room on the first floor. o this, an early start was necessary. must before we did anything else; but it was arranged that, whilst we took our repast, a carriage should be prepared, and that we should get out immediately afterwards. In the meanwhile, we took our seats at the window, and looked abroid to see what was to be seen. "What is that building opposite ?" inquired I of the waiter

"That is the jail." he replied. "And whose carriage is this at the door ?" said I; for the odd-looking foreign carriage was still there.

"What sort of a romance?" inquired he. "What sort of a romance?" inquired he. "Why," I answered, "Vandyck is reported to have predicted, on seeing a portrait of Lord Strafford, that he was destined to come to a bad end ; now, I do not think that lady is destined to come to a good one."

"She is very handsome," observed my companion. "Very," I roplied; and so she was-dark complexioned, magnificent full black eyes, a fine-ly formed month and nose, though these were rather on the large scale, and with that uniformity of color so often beautiful in Spanish and Italian women. She was affired in a nole silk of ventre de biche, and wore a delicate pink satin honnet, and an elegant white blond veil. Whilst we were making these observations, the gentleman stepped in, the carriage drove away, and is far greater than to those of France. And our luncheon being shortly announced, we censed to think more of the Count and Countess

As soon, however, as we had satisfied the claims of hunger, we remembered the business that was before us, and calling for our carriage, we proceeded to the foot of Mount St. Angelo, where we alighted, in order to walk up the hill. There stood the foreign carriage; and I rather hoped that, as its owners were still viewing the falls, we might have another opportunity of in. bably the foremost in manufacturing interests. specting the handsome pair. Some children, who were always in waiting to earn a few pence by showing travelers the way, here joined us, and advancing leisurely on account of the heat, we commenced the ascent. There were gates at different intervals on the road, at each of which some children were stationed, one or two of whom, after letting us through, generally fell our train. I think we had passed two or defeated the Russians in battle. The Russian three of these, when we saw several people hastening down the mountain towards us, with a speed that implied that they were urged by some more than common motive; and as they drew nearer, we distinguished a clamor, mostly of children, all talking as fast as they could at the ton of their voices and costinguished to the solution on the South and the truncation of the second to the solution on the South as top of their voices, and gestulating with the utat wints

They then carried on a dispute among them-selves, in which some said "Yes," and others "No;" but we could not understand more of their patois. At length, one of them pointing at and a bloody battle will probably decide the the advancing group, cried out, with character-istic energy; Si eccolo!" (Yes, there he is;) and on looking forwards, I descried in the midst until much more important intelligence than any of the party, walking so fast that he seemed yet received will arrive. Should the Tarks sucto be under the influence of the bighest excite to be under the induces of the higness excite-ment, or else trying to out walk his companions, the owner of the carriage, Count Z -. "Che sia? che sia ?" I exclaimed eagerly, as we reached the party : but they all dashed past us, whilst the whole of our train fell into theirs; and if my companion had not laid violent hand on one urchin, and presented his secession, we should have been left standing on the hill-side by but on the over a straining on the first side by ourselves. After straining our eyes after them for som minutes, guessing, and wonderlog, and perplexing ourselves as to what had happened, and where the lady could be, we resolved to has-ten forward with all the speed we could, in the hope of having our curiosity satisfied, and of perhaps meeting the countess at the farm house, or cottage, which we understood was to be found it the top of the mountain. When we got in sight of this dwelling, our little guide ran forwards; and we presently saw him talking to a woman who was standing at the door, and who ultimately appeared to be the only living soul left upon the hill. The woman nce more called out : "Che sia? Dov'e la donna ?" (Where is the lady ?) "Morts !" (Dead !) was the roply.

" Dead !" we reiterated in amazement. "Dead !" receated the woman : " murdered
