This cession of the lands to the several States in which they lie relieves the federal governand from the large patronage connected with the management. Any safe measure which reduces the patronage of the general government must commend itself to general approval. That patronage is far too large; occupies far too much of the time and attention of the executive officers; is demoralising in its tendency, and does not always secure the most faithful public service. Yet that patronage is every year increasing, as the population, wealth and business interest of the country increases. It is time it was reduced. So far, then, as the new land bill transfers a portion of this patronage to the State governments, it will work well. The State governments can manage the lands within their limits much better than the general government.

and if the House adopts it, it will doubtless become a law. The Washington Union closes an article on the
