UNITED STATES AND SPAIN. Not long since, a conference of United States ministers was held at Ostend, for the purpose of considering the proper course to be pursued by our government towards Spain. The Spanish crument refuses all redress for the repeated injuries its officials have committed upon our commerce and our citizens, and refuses all apology or further negotiation on the subject. Our government has demanded redress. It is refused; and there the matter stands. What shall be done? Shall this country succemb to the old despotiem of Spain, or enforce redress, as other nations do? That is the simple question arising out of the present state of affairs.

Those who are in favor of having our government take such a course as they recommend, are polating to many instances in which other commercial nations have adopted similar measures. Thus England, for the security of her commerce in the Mediterauean, seized upon the fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance to that sca. In the same way she took Cape Town, at the southern extremity of Africa, from the Dutch, for a similar purpose. A nation, it is argued, has a right to resort to such measures eves of force as are necessary to remove a troublesome neighbor, or to prevent aggressions upon its commerce by a nation showing a disposition to commit depredations, and refusing re-United States will not be necessary.
