Bis conduct, since then, as developed in his correspondence, seems to show that his unfortunate frame of mind has been the occasion of much unbappiness to himself, and has betrayed him into a course of conduct, which his best friends can view only with regret. Here is the secret of his difficulties. General Wool, during the Mexican war, was in General Taylor's division. It is known he was not a favorite with the stern old hero of Baena Vista, and that his council had not the weight with his superior officer which ordinarily would have been due to his rank. Col. Davis.—

Baens Vista, and that his council had not the weight with his superior officer which ordinarily would have been due to his rank. Col. Davis,—then of the Mississippi rifies, and now Secretary of War,—on the contrary had the unbounded confidence of General Taylor, who advised with him on every subject, and relied upon his unering judgment in many a trying military emergency. A mind open to suspicion, as General Wool's has been of late, would naturally feel some unpleasantness when a subordinate officer, who had thus by force of circumstances been brought into such intimate association with his superior,—is elevated to be head of the War penalty of the work of and recalling a common grery—man the same anxieties and the same hope agritating the two countries—than the same views and the same countries—than the same views and the same intentions animating the two governments in every corner of the globe?
