His wife was a loving, sincere woman, quick to feel. Words, to her, were indeed things. They never fell upon her ears as idle sounds. How often was her poor heart bruised by them. On this particular morning, Mrs. Winkleman, whose health was feeble, found herself in a weak, nervous state. It was only by an effort that she could rise above the morbid irritability that afflicted her. Earnestly did she strive to repress the disturbed beatings of her heart, but sho strove in vain, and it seemed to her, as it often does in such cases that everything went wrong. The children were fretful, the cook dilatory and cross, and Mr. Winkleman impatient, because sundry little matters pertaining to his wardrobe

ONLY A FEW WORDS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR,

Words are little things, but they sometimes strike hard. We wield them so easily that we are apt to former, their hidden power. Filly spoken, they fall like the sunshine, the dewand the fortilizing rain-but, when unfitly, like the frost, the heil, and the desolating tempest. Some men speak as they feel or think, without calcu-listing the form of what they say: and then lating the force of what they say; and then seem very much surprised if any one is burt or offended. To this class belonged Mr. Winkle-
