The Character of Clay's Eloquence. [From the Presbyterian Quaterly for June.]

It was our good fortune to hear the peroration of Henry Clay's groat speech on the Removal of the deposits. He was a Western man, of this Western hemisphere; a kind of incarnation of American genius, self taught; with little cultivation of any kind from books, like one of the magnificent trees of his own Kentucky, an outgrowth of nature. If we had not heard him, we feel quite sure that we should have gone to the grave without the knowledge of the amazing superiority of spoken words over the silent elo quence of the printed page. We never before knew the meaning of the word oratory. There was nor a syllable of rant, there was not one tone f vociferation. Our readers, who never heard Mr. Clay, will hardly believe us when we say that, in the very tempest, torrent, and whirlwing of his passion, he spoke slowly, deliberately— every stone about the weight of a talent. We will tell the reader of our fancy, not quite sure that he will understand it; it put us in mind of the trained horses of Apollo, who drew the char-lot of the Sun. The charlot was of the richest and most brilliant workmanship, the harness of per, was as distinctly sudible as a distant running water at midnight, and his out pouring of denunciation was slow and steady as the tread every letter, was distinctly audible, and as muas the fall of water in a marble fountain : enried first beautifully ground his arm, like that of Phidian Jove, and was launched, not as by stealth, but with a deliberation that would exceed belief. His language had, by the instinct of a wonderful genious, a classic polish, which learned by slow and sedulous
