DEATH OF OCOLA.

The Indian Chief stood pensively
Within his prison cell—
He who had led his warlike tribe,
Where many fighting fell—
And, though his death was on him then,
Through rage the fever high—
Still anger set upon his brow,
And vengeance fired his eye!

Imagination carried him
To days that then were past,
When followed by his gallant band,
He braved the battle's blast;
And saw the bells that round him fell
As thickly as the hail,
When wintry clouds obscure the sky,
And wintry winds prevail.

He mused—and then compared his state—
The present with the past;
Once, fighting for his native land—
Now, bound in fetters fast!
His haughty spirit aghast control—
Insulted was his pride—
A short farewell—a bitter curse—
And Ocola died!

From the English Annual for 1838.

ZEMBA AND ZORAYDE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'OUR ISLAND.'

"Zemba, and what are these?" said a white traveller to his guide, as they were passing with a kofie (caravan) through the land where the sand storm rages, and the sroc breathes its withering blast. "Those," returned the African, "are the hills of Mandara whence the iron comes which points our spears." "And those?" continued the white man, pointing to other lofty peaks which towered to the southward. "They," again replied the negro, with an inquiring look, "are they far hence, four days' journey?" "Why so anxious?" he seemed as though he would have added. "And far beyond these last, see mightier summits still gird the distant horizon." The traveller was intent upon his question. "La illah e Allah!" exclaimed a Mussulman of the party, "we know nothing of that dark land; Kerdias and Kaffirs (infidels, not Mahomedans) who eat horses are the dwellers there." "And the mountains?" once more asked the Christian. "Mountains!" said the Mahomedan, "two months' journey to the south, large, large Moon mountains." "To the west you have a mighty stream?" "The great river," said the white man. "Which runs to the sea, far to the south of Timbuctoo?" "No, no, Allah Kerim!" replied the worshippers of the prophet, "it turns and flows eastward to the Nile!" "Impossible!" was the answer of the traveller. "Hadaf Kaffir, (there is the infidel,) let me look at the map of the Sultan Bello!" said the Moslem with a loud voice. "Illa Alla Mahomed rassoul Allah!" (there is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet,) exclaimed a number of people upon hearing this appeal; and the Christian awakened from his reverie, was glad to retreat from the stern gaze of the fanatics who surrounded him.

It was a kafia or kofie, travelling from Oudat to Bornou, with slaves. The poor negroes, pensive and unspiced, could with difficulty maintain the route. The whip shaken over their heads quickened the most vigorous, some were suffered to hang on the camel's back; and one, in the last stage of weakness, was lashed to one of those patient beasts who tread the desert with so sure a step. Distress was indeed the portion of these captives, who had been wrested from their homes by the rapacity of a neighboring Sultan. The tall scorched sand hill where, an oasis never lurks, spent water-skin, the panting negroes, the death-like gasp, are the common lot of those with whom men traffic as with the cattle of the field.

Zemba, himself a slave, had now fallen back while with his master into the fear of the caravan. Here, for the first time, he attracted the attention of the Christian—Zemba, said he, "there is a woman who does honor to your race? The guide advanced and fixed his eyes upon the stranger. A Turkadee (body dress) hung gracefully beneath her shoulders; her plaited hair loosely on either cheek, whilst numerous chains of silver were spread in an ornamental array round her waist. The bitterest badge of her low condition. About to stand in the public market, a prey to the capricious purchaser, she viewed her gaudy necklace and coral band with pensive sadness, too well assured that her tinsel trappings would last no longer than the chaffing of the merchant whose property she was. Zemba started, and prostrated himself before the wandering negress. "What is this?" she exclaimed in the language of her country. "Is Zorayde," cried Zemba. "And you," returned the princess, "the valiant chief of the Tibbo, and both slaves!" she added with deep emotion. "Mistress of my heart," said the African, "what sad fate has brought the loved by Zorayde to this hated spot?" "Alas! sultan," replied she, "the ghrazie, (expedition of plunderers) in our dark hour, the Arab robbers and cruel Bornou rushed into the peaceful haunts of the Tibbo, drove us from our place of hides, our woody belt, and mountain pass, and chased us like sheep along our native heights. But we rallied; arrows flew like sand of the desert, women such as I am hurled masses of rock on the heads of our invaders, and they fled with poisoned arrows rankling in their shrunken limbs. But they made me captive, sultan. Zemba," she added, after a pause, "brave Zemba; how is this change of fortune?" "I, too, Zorayde, was the victim of a lawless ghrazie, but not like you, victorious. Our village was encompassed by the men of Mourouk one summer's morning. The plunderers left their tents and canoes at three hours from us, and at daybreak burst on our defenceless borders." "But your fastness, sultan?" "The muskets of the Arabs, Zorayde, lay between us and our mountain shelter. It was too late."

The white man and his strange pilgrimage now engrossed their converse, but whilst they were speaking of him as a phenomena in their land, the kofie entered a deep and wooded track. The bush and the thicket lay around them. There was the mimosa, the mangrove, sleeping in the swamps, the tall acacia, and the keen edged tuloh. And there were the watchful tenants of the forest, the shrill, the hoo byena, the deep red lion, the wary panther, the fearful tifo, the scorpion, the fierce musquito. Night was coming on, night so terrible to the negroes, who fear the growling beasts of prey with most anxious dread. Indeed, their eyes wandered eagerly on all sides as soon as the sun had set, and "Wara bili, bili," (see the great lion) was on their lips, as they passed each shady copse. They were also not without reason for their terrors. The wolf and the panther might be seen darting from bush to bush at the approach of evening, and hincrouched ready for his victim, was no uncommon spectacle in these dreary woods. Not every day has Africa beheld a dauntless spirit, who, like Mungo Park, dared tread the wilderness alone, amidst the roar of hungry thousands, the deepening gloom of unknown shades, and the barrenness of a parched and desert land. The kofie crowded together, the slaves (slave merchants) murmured at their guides, the native trembled and went on with hasty steps. But at this instant, there was a cry of distress, and a general halt was ordered. Each sought eagerly for his companion amidst the darkness, and at length the name of Zorayde was called in vain. Not a moment was lost. The caravan was turned back with shouts, but there was no answer. The merchants insisted upon proceeding. Even the owner of the slave Zorayde was so terrified, that he was willing at once to abandon her to the tyrants of the woods. Zemba and the white man alone remained. Struck with alarm for her fate, they made the forest echo with the name of Zorayde. Again they rushed onwards, leaving the kofie far behind, and once more they thought they heard the voice of anguish amidst the moans of the thunder. At this moment, a flash, one of those sweeping blazes which in these tropic lands lay all things wide and open, lightened the dreary waste. It was but the gleam of a moment, for dense darkness instantly wrapt all things within its bosom, yet was that bright shaft sufficient to reveal Zorayde beneath the paw of a vast panther. The travellers were dumb with surprise. Neither ventured a syllable. The white man, however, grasped his gun, and the African his club. They darted, as well as they were able, towards the spot, but amidst so deep a gloom, it had been dangerous to fire. "Another friendly flash!" exclaimed Zemba, and at the moment the fire of heaven gushed forth again, laying bare the narrowest cranny and most hidden track. The beast had retreated, after toying with his victim, and was now in the act of springing afresh upon Zorayde, as she lay spellbound on the earth. Zemba snatched the gun from the hand of his master, pushed it with desperation to the ear of the savage, and fired; at the same instant, he fell headlong to the ground, as though instead of a deliverer, he had been a suicide. But the white man advanced, and found the beast quivering in the agonies of death, struggling with upturned paws towards the sky, whilst the damsel of Tibbo still lay motionless beneath the fatal bush. Zemba at length started up, frantic with agitation, and smiting his breast with agony, long refused the cheering news of the Englishman, who in vain pointed towards the dead panther, and assured him he had saved the maiden's life. Zorayde had suffered little from the gripe of the wild beast, and towards the afternoon of the next day, they were so fortunate as to rejoin the kofie in safety.

Some months had passed away after this adventure, when the Sheikh of Bornou declared his resolution of holding a court of justice for the trial of two unhappy beings who had broken the stern observances of his seraglio. In the court yard of his palace, surrounded by his warriors and the governors of his provinces, sat as sultan, a man of imposing aspect, grave demeanor, and unchanging decision. He had given orders that the case should be heard in full view. Every one trembled for the captives, for the Sheikh's inexorable visitations of the frailties of womanhood, were too well known to raise a doubt as to the result.

Near to the great man sat a celebrated fight, or man of letters, one who had, by dint of forty years' experience, learned every chapter in the Koran, and was held in great estimation by his master. The white traveller also formed one of the group, and being in high favour with the sultan, he was indulged in a place very close to the seat of judgment. The sheikh who had just disposed of a trifling case of theft, now addressed the Englishman in the interval before the greater culprits were produced. "Rais," said he, "you must rest satisfied; you can go no further. The sons of Allah are branding their spears at all points; I could not let you advance with safety.—We are not wiser than our fathers, and they knew and taught us that the river you are in quest of, flows eastward, through vast Kerdy countries, to the Nile." The Englishman remembered the fanatical laugh and loud clamour in the kofie, and he bowed assent. "With what intentions you come to our country to see the Joliba, stranger, we know not," continued the sheikh; "but to the east, believe me, there are cannibals who devour their prisoners; and at the flesh torn from the backs of living animals, and to the west—you remember the fate of your countryman?" "I do, but he beheld the Joliba," returned the white man with emotion. "The entrance of the criminals prevented all further converse. The Englishman started and trembled. Zemba and Zorayde stood before the sheikh, the one arrayed in a splendid silken tunic, (shirt), the other in the same turkadee she wore when her companion snatched her from the panther's gripe. The judge beheld them with forbidding aspect, and bade the witnesses appear. Their testimony was short, and it soon appeared beyond controversy that Zemba had ventured beyond the precincts of the inner apartments, a crime punishable with death in Bornou. A mournful silence ensued, for it was expected that the sheikh would instantly wave his hand, the signal for execution. But Zemba came forward at that moment, and arrested the dread mandate. "Hear me," said the map of Tibbo; "mercy, great sheikh! I will lead the fath (marry) with her." This declaration created a general sensation throughout the court; it was an offer, which sometimes appeared the arm of justice, and he rallied in the breasts of the pitying spectators. But the sheikh moved not—he did not as much as speak with his counsellors. He vouchsafed no answer, but viewed the culprits with unbending rigour. Another fearful suspense prevailed, and the sultan had now raised his arm, and the white man sprang forward, and appealed against the fatal sentence. "By the head of Mustapha!" exclaimed the sheikh, starting up from his throne; "yet stay, it comes to me to calm with the stranger." "Rais," continued he, "speak on."

ENGLAND.

Exchange at New York, on London, 8 1/2 a 7 per cent. premium.

An auctioneer in the West of England has just exhibited the most inventive of his London brethren in the art of puffing, by announcing in a country paper that he has recently won out two lakemen, and is now on the second end of the third.

Chief North of England Railway.—The works of the railway commenced near Northallerton, last week.—York Herald, March 31.

Two indictments laid by the Liverpool Town Council against the owners of alkali works were tried at Lancaster, and in both cases the works were pronounced to be a nuisance. The most important case, namely that against Mr. Mowbray, remains for trial; and it is not likely to be tried for some days. There are also several other cases of the same kind for trial.—March 31.

At the Warwick Assizes on Monday, Mr. Justice Park, in the case of Fort v. Alport, said, that political unions were disgraceful to all men who were members of them, and ruinous to the country. As an old man he, he recommended all young men to avoid any connection with them.

The York Assizes, Mr. Matthew Spillings, surgeon, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, for the manslaughter of Isabella Turner, at Ecclesfield, near Sheffield, by an improper use of instruments.—March 31.

There is now living in the pleasant village of Lofthouse and its vicinity, near Gouthborough, in the North Riding, 6 brothers of the name of Adamson, whose united ages amount to 450 years.

During the late severe weather a most beautiful wild stock was discovered upon the Park House estate, Westchester, by an anonymous person, who having heard it authenticated that the stock, though very wild, has been taken by a dog, resolved to try the experiment. He therefore endeavoured to keep out of sight until near his game, when he uncovered his head, whilst at the same time, making a most hideous scream, the bird became so wild, pettish and motionless, that it flew to the top of a tree, where Mr. Dobson took it up.—Shrewsbury Chronicle.

A considerable wager was decided a few days since, at Mr. West's patent range manufactory, King's Road, Chelsea, who undertook to cook with three-penny worth of coals, a cod-fish steamed, a leg of pork steamed, a loaf of boiled beef, a pig's trotter baked, ramp steaks steamed, with four sorts of vegetables boiled and steamed, the whole weighing upwards of 50 lbs. The fire was lighted at twelve o'clock, and the whole of the dishes were placed on the table at three o'clock, precisely. The banquet was partaken of by 25 gentlemen, old residents of Chelsea and its vicinity; who after dinner drew up a doctype expressive of their perfect satisfaction of the manner in which the dinner had been cooked.—March 31.

Two fellows, having the appearance of farmers' laborers, conducted a woman into Ludlow market on Saturday with a halter round her waist, and publicly sold her for 3s. The purchaser was the husband's brother! The wretches afterwards adjourned to a low pot-house to refresh themselves.—Worcester Journal.

IRELAND.

A Foreign Woman.—At the Longford assizes, a young woman, named Courigan, presented a man named Cori for abduction. After her examination she addressed Judge Torrens as follows:—"Your worship, as I have got a man ten times his superior, and as the prisoner did not treat me ungenerously, (bearing the taking me away, I hope you will look over it as light as you can, and long life to you my lord." His lordship said he should attend to her recommendation.

Mr. O'Connell's proposition for the settlement of the tithe question is viewed by all parties in this country much more favorably than any plan hitherto suggested.—Limerick Chronicle.

Ball at the Castle.—The usual annual ball in honor of St. Patrick's day—postponed in consequence of the illness of his Excellency the Lord Mayor.—Nothing could surpass the beautiful scene which these rooms presented—the tables ornamented with flowers of every hue, and a variety of other ornaments of the most exquisite workmanship. At half-past ten o'clock his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and Countess of Lincoln entered St. Patrick's Hall, accompanied by the officers of the Household, when the quadrille band, stationed in the gallery struck up God save the queen. His Excellency was attired in a field marshal's uniform, and, notwithstanding his recent indisposition, looked remarkably well. Shortly after that time his Excellency entered the ball-room, having committed to the air of St. Patrick's Day—the Chamberlain opening the ball, which continued till an early hour this morning.—Dublin E Post, March 22.

Neuromintimatory Temperance Tea Party.—On Friday evening, the second Temperance Society was held at New-street-hall, in the Market-house. The rooms were most tastefully decorated with evergreens, and three large transparencies, with six Scripture mottoes, made the scene delightful. Upwards of two hundred were present. Never was the want of a larger room more felt, as from the anxiety manifested by numbers of the most respectable inhabitants to procure tickets, two hundred more could have been issued, had there been accommodation.—After tea the company joined in singing a hymn written for the occasion, Wybrants O'phoria, Esq. was then called to the chair. The Secretary, the Rev. Robert Gage, read a most interesting report of the Society, interspersed with some very instructive facts. Robt. F. Dill, Esq. M. D. the Rev. Messrs. Wilson and M'Ninch, and Mr. Cathcart, successfully addressed the meeting in a manner so impressive, as to command the deepest attention, the effect of which was proved by thirty five persons joining the Society. A great number of the most respectable ladies of the town and neighbourhood gratefully mentioning their presence.—Derry Sentinel.

It is rumored in the fashionable circles that an Irish Barrister of distinction has been so fortunate as to make a favourable impression on the wealthiest heiress of England, Miss Angela Baretts Court.—Court Journal.

A report has prevailed here that Nicholas Purrell O'Gorman, Q. C., is the happy individual alluded to. This is enabled to pronounce unfeignedly, as we have reason to know that this distinguished legal functionary is in the era of a matrimonial alliance with the Baroness Letzen, late Governess to the Queen.—Dublin E. Packet.

WALES.

Ancient Welsh MSS.—We are happy to announce that H. Hall, Esq. M. P. of Lincoln, has received a communication from Lord John Russell, stating that her majesty is graciously pleased to become the Patroness of the Society for the publication of Ancient Welsh MSS. Under such auspices the Society cannot fail to succeed.

Our Fair on Monday afforded a tolerable show of cattle, with prices looking up. Cows with calves at their side varying from 27 to 102. In the Horse Fair the supply was more than equal to the demand, and with but few good ones.—Derby Herald.

Langston Fair.—This Fair on Tuesday was well attended, and the sales in every thing but horses were brisk. Oxen sold from 210 to 212; cows, with calf, 28 to 210; small store pigs from 30s. to 23. There was a large show of horses, but few only changed owners.

A large concourse of persons assembled yesterday in Southgate street, to witness the funeral of the late Mr. John Chester of the Tyburn Inn, in this city, who was buried at St. Mary de Croy church with dramatic honours. The procession started soon after 12 o'clock, headed by a band of music. The principal attention was of course the appearance of the brethren, 13 in number, who were attired in long white robes, "venerable," &c. bearing the paraphernalia and banners of the Lodge, these were followed by a number of other brethren in black robes, &c. Several members of the Worcester and Cheltenham Lodges attended. The funeral service having been read an address was delivered at the grave by Mr. Taylor, a member of the Worcester Lodge. The procession then returned to the Lodge Room at the Tyburn. The hospitality of this procession naturally drew together a large crowd, among whom we regret to state there were many who conducted themselves in a most highly indecorous, and not at all consonant with the solemnity of the occasion. This description of conduct was not confined to the street, but was even extended to the church and churchyard, where the only object appeared to be to gratify a ferocious curiosity, without any regard to the proper decorum which ought to be observed on such occasions.—Glastonbury Chronicle.

The Church in Wales.—A most unusual custom prevails at funerals in the Principality. Instead of any fixed fees being payable to the officiating minister, the friends of the deceased offer what each individual may deem proper, the clergyman standing like a jack in a queue ground in a cove on St. Tuesday, while the money is being pitched for, if not at him, on the altar; when this part of the ceremony is over, the money is taken-up, counted, and published with "I thank you." At a parish in Merionethshire lately, at the funeral of a respectable female, her four sons not wishing their mother buried as it were by subscription, determined that the custom of work in his house, will be made to order at the shortest notice, with assistance and durability; and on terms as low as can be done elsewhere.
