EDITORIAL.

Nay! start not reader! we are not going to inflict upon thee one of those old fashioned hackneyed and qualmish dissertations upon the tender passion, with which our newspapers and periodicals are so plentifully filled, but we intend in a good, sober, serious, sedate, and sensible point of view, to speak of its blessings and its curses, and if some plain home-made sentiment should find its way into the following paragraph, please remember that charity coverein a multitude of sins, and thus rid thyself of a small proportion of thine, by refusing to accuse us of romance.

Reader! wert thou ever in love ! hast thou evexperienced that sickly, hang-dog sensation, which thinks of a pair of bright eyes and a sharp razor at the same moment; hast thou ever, when setting before a warm fire, enjoying the luxuries of a long-nine, with thy toes turned towards heaven, we repeat it-bast thou ever associated a lovely smiling face, with the bottom of a duck pond? If thou hast escaped all these heart-hending fancies, dear reader! we pity thee, and pray that thy single heart may never be jumped upon by those cerulean imps, which dance and gyrate around the eleepless heads of the dissatisfied. Aided by our experience and observation, we will proceed with our homily, as we have arraged it in the preface. First, the blessings of love-And they are manifold-who would exchange the emotions of a strong, bonest and manly, heart; when for the first time he discovers that the bright being, before whom he has prostrated all his ear hy affections, has thrown her own bundle of love nto the heap, we say-who would exchange the feelings eccompanying that discovers, for all the untold wealth of the Indies ! It is a heart-swelling blessing that no riches can balance. There is always a mine of happy feelings, out joyous sensations, associated with the idea of first love: when a being whom you have known from a childhood, I whose growth you have watched into beautiful maturity, with all the care that a gardener expends upon his first gooseberry bush, murmurs, for the first time, her thrilling whisper of dependence into your delighted ears. Then the bright and heatt warming smile, which always greets your Parson of the same place-Bury Post. approach, the swelling pride with which she listens to your slightest enconium, and the trusting make up a package of blessings, that-that-thata remison steak is no touch to . . .

wary. She saw a great deal of justice in what was said and was sufficiently contented with liberty and six thousand a year, not to be highly impatient for a husband; but our heroine had no aversion to a lover, especially to so handsome a lover as Mr. Ferdia and Fitzroy. Accordingly, she neither accepted nor discarded him : but kept him in hope, and suffered him to get in debt with his tailor and his coachmaker, on the strength of becoming Mr. Fitzroy Convulvulus. Time went on and excuses and delays were easily found; however, our hero was sanguine, and so were his perents. A breakfast at Chiswick and a putrid fever carried off the latter, within one week of each other; but not till they had blessed Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy, and rejoiced that they had left him so well provided for.

Now, then, our hero depended solely on the crabbed old uncle and Miss Helen Convolvulus; the former, though a baronet and a satirist, was st binker and a man of business; he looked very distast-fully at the Hyperian curls and white teeth of Mr. Ferdinand Pitzroy.

If I make you my heir, said he, I expect you will continue the hank."
