PUZZLED .-- There is an enecdote extint, admi rably flustrative of the powerful, firresistible and artful qualities of forensic oratory. A countryman being present at the trial of a criminal, and having heard all the evidence, was told not to make up his mind on the subject until he had als, heard the speeches of the couns I. Accordingly, he sat and very patiently listened to the add ess of the coursel for the crown, or presecution, to the jury; when the speaker clased, the mexperiouced auditor was a ked whether he shought the man' guiliy of innicent. O i, guilty, of course,' he r . plied, nobody on get over that." The counsel for the prisiner then that up the case, and in the course of his argument s mintorted the testimony and exhibited its i iconsistency; sibe abired the · prosecution for pressing his unfortunate client with all the extre nities of legal power, and so pathetically, appealed to the sympathies of the jury, that the countryman came to the conclusion, that the man was not only insocent, but very hardly dealt by withal. The gentlemen of the bar were then followed by the learned judge, who with quiet and dispussion ste tone and manner, finhtuly reviewed the evidence through sut portroying both its strong points and its weak, divesting it of its irrelevances and mescating it clearly to the unprojudiced contem lit on of the mind. When he had concluded, the countrymon was asked to decide.
