

I have said that upon all these subjects I have very little to say...

There are three propositions on this subject which I would submit to the consideration of every candid man...

1. The first, is that in the present state of society, in the present condition of the country, paper not only does not, but will, continue to, form the great mass of circulation...

2. That it is a thing most desirable that, in this mass, there should be part at least which should pass current every where...

3. If this is yielded, gentlemen, there is only one more question to consider; and that is, can a currency thus universal in character...

A MAN KILLED AT THE MILL DAM.—We learn that a young man by the name of...

1. That paper will form the great mass of our circulation; 2. That it is desirable that of this mass...

In the nature of things it is both reasonable and just that all parts of the United States...

Now, gentlemen, where is the power, where is the power? I say that the power is implied in the authority of Congress to regulate commerce...

It is derived from that—for in order to discharge its duty to the people, Congress must be empowered to regulate commerce...

But Mr. Madison yielded even if his private judgment had not been convinced, he said, as every man of sense will say, that the thing has been settled by the repeated decisions of the Constitutional interpreters...

Now, gentlemen, I will not press this point farther, because I see with too much that the people are not in a state to receive such things...

especially in the Atlantic and Commercial States, the evils which have heretofore distressed the community are not so severely felt...

And, gentlemen, let me say, though we in New-England, and the Northern States, generally, feel no particular inconvenience from the source...

One other remark I will make upon this subject. Seven or eight years since I declared in my place in the Senate, that having very much desired the continuance of the charter to the bank from a sincere conviction...

It is desirable, it is useful, for all the purposes of society, and especially all those connected with commercial States...
