WINTER. ny LEWIS G. CLARK.

Give us thy hand, OLD WINTER! Thou art welcome! Thou awakenest visions of other days, when Hans, in the simplicity of his childhood, believed that . Thanksgiving, and . Christmas, some. how or other, came into town in an old-fashioned double-scated sleigh, with racing grey horses and the appurtenances, consisting of a Forge, Fur cracking whip, wielded by an invisible Jehu.-How the idea got into his head, is more than he can tell. Exquisitely happy were those days of uncareful childhood; when the winter school called scores of rosy-cheeked urchins, hallowing on the morning air, through the snow to the old red school house in the village of Han's nativity. The larger boys all with their sleds, on which sat their sisters, with their 'dinner-basket' on their laps; | July, 1828, granted to Jacob Barr, who conveyed and their smaller brothers floundering through the drifts which they sought, contrary to the last inBrown; and the other part thereof being the unjunctions of their mothers, along the fences. The | divided threefourths of several tracts of unimprohuge box-stove roared a 'good morning' to them, as the boys stamped off the ice from their shoes, of Henry Eckler, Martin Kuhns, Jacob Leffler, and the girls united the strings which kept down and others, surveyed on warrant granted to Adtheir pantalettes. As there were no unlucky flies to inter and imprison in transparent quills, nor poke berrics wherewith to paint the sides of their noses farthest from the master's eye, the boys, perforce, studied their tasks; and the girls, as girls always are, were equally the objects of pedagogical favor. Was the day 'thawy,' the noon-time witnessed magic castles erected and the numberless streaks of bare turf showed where the huge balls of snow of which they were constructed had been rolled into unwieldy masses; and the wet mittens under the stove in the afternoon amply compensated for the want of water in the iron basin on the top of it.—Shouting when four o'clock released them, they hurried home, only to prepare for the evening sport of 'riding down hill.' Hans would give worlds to be a boy again, and for one single moon light evening to slide down Furnacehill, as of yore! . . . When a few winters have passed over your boyish head, beloved reader, and you first knew that magnetic feeling, which told you what gave the charm to rosy lips, and you guessed what kissing was, did you not feel all ecstacy while the well-bedizzened horses and the belle-enlivened sleigh scoured with half a scoure of you over hill and through dale; the thick hood of the maiden next you being excuse unquestionable for telling her pretty lips what her car could not 50 well comprehend? You needn't be ashamed to confess it; for those were, let Hans tell you, the golden days of your life. Before the wide fireplace of thy father's kitchen, thou hast, days long gone by, arranged the pippins just outside the andirons, and placed the gallon-pitcher of good brisk October on the coals, and cracked hickory nuts, (yes, and the more accessible butternut,) for the semi-circle of smiling, grown up sisters and sweet blooming cousins, until the apples were roasted and the eiter warnied.-Then, when nine o'clock came, and thy spectacled and pious grandmother had read a chapter in the Holy Book, and thy father had knelt in prayer, didst thou not, as Hans does now, while thou laidst thy head upon thy pillow, and heard the whistling wind shaking thy window. bless Old Winter for making you so happy? . . . Courteous reader, Hans, while he draweth up the bed-clothes, biddeth thee Good

MILITARY ANECDOTE. -- Many years ago, at an annual muster of one of our local regiments the commander, a very worthy and an able officer, but who had the misfortune to be rather illiterate, gave the word for the regiment to fire by platoons from right and left eternally'-(he meant alternately.) A wag belonging to one of the light companies on the right, observed to his comrades, Act us take the colonel at his word—at least let us fire until our ammunition is expended.' The soldiers caught at the idea, and almost as quick as thought the word passed down the line. The first round from the platoons was regularly fired -but then ensued a scene which no pen can describe Crack !-went a half dozen guns on the right. Crack!—went as many more on the left. Bang!—went a whole company in the cen-. are. Pop-pop-pop-pop-went single guns all through the line. The officers stood for a few moments petrified with amazement. 'Cease firing,' roared the colonel, and dashed in among the troops. His example was followed by all the other field officers, who rode furiously up and Jown the line, brandishing their swords, and bawling out at the top of their lungs, 'Cease firing.' Bugles sounded-drums beat-but all to no purpose. As soon as the officers succeeded in stopping the firing at one point-crack-crack-pop-pop-it would break out in another. At length the officers, wearied with their exertions, and having pretty essentially used up their horses, concluded to smother their wrath and wait the issue with patience; and not until their last round was expended, did the troops cease firing. Then the officers all along the line, who had been foaming with rage, and threatened their men with all sorts of punishments, as if simultaneously seized with one common impulse at the ludierousness of the above scene, could not restrain their laughter, and their cachinations were no bad imitation of the feu de joine of the soldiers. Oh, it was rare sport, and I never shall forget that scene, if I live cternally. - Portland American.
