Day by day the number of our soldiers diminiehed. They were seen expiring in the streets, and so great was the weakness of the men, that they were permitted to mount guard seated .---Discouraged and disheartened, the Genocse no longer performed the service of the national guard, fearful of compromising themselves should the Austrians bring back the oligarchical party.-From time to time, obseure rumors were affoat, that the despair of the inhabitants was about to break forth; and to prevent such an explosion, battalions, with loaded cannon occupied the principal streets and squares of the city.

The imperturable attitude of Massena had its effect upon the people of the army. The respec which this heroic officer inspired, eating, as he did, with the soldiers, their disgusting bread, living with them under the fire of the enemy, and duty, and the cares of responsibility, added to all their physical calamities-the respect which he inspired, I say, acted as a powerful restraint upon all. In the midst of desolated Genoa,

Several of the general's sides-decamp had, by courageous and persevering efforts, rossed the lines, and brought in nows. Colonel's Reille, Franseschi, and Ortigoni, had adventured successfully, and had learned at one time, that the First Consul had set forth, and was on his way; and at another that he was crossing the Alps. One of the three, Franceschi, had left him descending the St. Bernard. But since the 20th of May, no further accounts of him had been received. Passed in this state of doubt and uncertainty, ten or twelve days seemed like so many ages, and it was asked, in a desponding tone, how it could happen that, in ten days, Gen. Bonaparte should have crossed the space which manner so decided, that it was not again proposed. He insisted that the army should retire whither it would, with its arms and baggage, with colors flying, and with the liberty to serve and fight, when beyond the beseiger's lines. If not,' said he, to the Austrian flag of truce, 'I will sally forth from Genos, sword in hand. With 8,000 famished men, I will attack your camp, and I will fight, till I cut my way through you.' The garrison was permitted to depart, but it was insisted that its commander should remain a prisoner in person, for they feared that with a leader such as he, this garrison might cut its way from Genoa to Savona, join with the troops of Suchet, and attempt some formidable enterprise upon the rear of Baron de Melas. To calm the indignation of Massena, the end of this condition so honorable to himself, was sustaining, with unshaken firmness, the weight of avowed. He would not hear one word of it. It was then asked, that the garrison should leave by sea, that it might not have time to join Suchet's corps. To all these propositions he opposed his usual answer, that 'He would cut his way through them.' It was at length agreed, that 8000 men should pass by land, that is to say, those who were still able to support their arms. The convalescents were to be successively embarked, and transported to Suchet's general quarters. There remained 4000 invalids, whom the Austrians con-
