BATH.

The villages thicken. and the hills grow steep et as you approach Bath, and at last you are sud-denly shot into a bowl of palaces and verdure—the bottom covered with gardens, and the side with terraced crescents of architecture. I had just time to exclaim with wonder at the unexpected splendor of the hill sides surrounding us in, when the station roof slid over us like an extinguisher, and the conductor's voice announced that we were at Bath.

Leaving cloak and shawl, and ordering dinner at three, at the hotel adjoining the station, we tra-veled forth to ramble the town over, with three good hours before us-the return cars leaving at four. As I just now said, the bottom of this vase of hills is laid out in gardens, and we crosset to the other side upon a raised road which looks down upon a beautiful parterre of gravel walks and flowers, free to the public to look at. But the stranger stops at every second step, to gaze about and wonder. I had read very glowing descriptions of Bath, but my anticipation, even of its size, was three fourths less than the reality. Its picturesqueness is theatrical. No scene painter could cluster and pile up palaces, gardens, and spires, with more daring extravagance. The abund int quar-ries of free-stone in the neighborhood, have furnished all their building materials, and every house that is not beautifully antique, is of ornamen-tal architecture. I saw one or two beggars, but I did not see where they could live. Splendid squares, crescents, terraces and colonades, monop olize the town. We made straight for the 'Pump Room,' of course. It lies behind a prodigally Gothic abbey. (one of the most ornate and beautiful specimens of the Gothic I ever saw.) and with a large pixed court before it, surrounded by shops. It is mean ly one large room in a building, which is one of a block, and though it was doubtless a very splendid hall when first built, it is now outdone by the saloons of common theatres, and by the refresh-ment rooms' of railroad stations. A semicircular counter projects from the wall on one side, stud-den with cakes and glasses of chalybeate water, a another who never gave him any offence. He assented. 'You have seen districts in Europe, where not one man in fifty can read and sip. Had I been the solitary traveller I usually and I should have sat in a corner and 'put the screws' to the Ghost of Beau Nash and the belles of his brilliant time and circle-but I had better company than my own imagination, and the old master of ceremonies had only a thought sent after him.
