One of these promptitude, punctuality and perfection, and at houses was inhabited by a carpenter named Benoit, such a moderate and reasonable charge, that these you think their will be a rush at the doors? on whom suspicions strongly fell; for he had but for whom he was working continued to employ lately come to live in the town, and was very lithim, although they had not a very good opinion of tle known. Besides this, he had a gloomy ex-pression of countenance, which repelled people; hours earlier, and to go to bed later than be had How kind! when 500 Miss Prettyman's are tohis eyebrows were dark and clusely knit, and he been in the habit of doing, and also to work with to hire workmen, he could make moderate charges although he gave the very best timber and workmenship. By these means he not only retained his old customers, but gained new ones. He plainly perceived that he was still a suspected person; and that precaution was taken not to leave him by himself in a room: but this he took no further notice of than by a smile. But if in. passing through the streets; any one proposed to him to join in some wicked design, he gave him a a look that prevented all desire to repeat it. He saw that his accounts were examined with peculiar care: but he made them out so clearly, so detailed, and so minute, that people ended in say-ing he was too particular. "No," he would may. "I know very well that you have a bad opinion of me; and it is necessary that you should be con-vinced thoroughly that I am not cheating you." A fire broke out in a house in the neighborhood itself.
