nant, which obstructs the free circulation of the juices of plants and thus injures their growth.— Hence the utility of surface draining, or small ditches and gutters. Some suits are full of springs is causing them to be cold and unproductive, and hence the origin and utility of drains under the surface, to convey away the superfluous water.

In many parts of New England meadows are flooded in the fall and during the winter, with a beneficial effect-the water generally being impregnated with animal and vegetable matter, particu-larly if the stream flows through a cultivated region. In cold seasons it preserves the roots and leaves of grass from being injured. CONSOLIDATION.-Every gardner knows the

It is well known that all plants will not thrive equally well on the same soil; because some require particular part of the soil to perfect their seeds, while others require another part. Therefore, if the different kinds of vegetables are planted in succession on the same soil, each one will deprive it of that particular principle which is situated to its nature. This kind of rotation is found to take place in nature. Black and grey ash is generally found to succeed a growth of pitch pine. New lands produce strawberries and blueberries, and in a short time, they exhaust the soil of the particular principle necessary to their healthy growth, and then decay and disappear, and are replaced by other plants. The manner in which certain plants trav-
