THE CZAR. HIS COURT, HIS CAMP, AND HIS PEOPLE.

If If C CURT, MIS CAMP, AND HIS PEOPLE. Manners and Customs. The growth of Russian civilization has been so rapid, that the most carcless observers must detect many of the germs of former barbariam springing up amidstit. This perhaps it is which renders some of the most striking characteristics so ap-parent. It is almost impossible to enter into a de-tailed account of the manars and customs of a foreign people without running into error. Years of close study and residence are requisite to enable the inhabitant of one country fully to understand the minute traits of another, and to no people does this remark spply with more force than to the Russian; in consequence of their chamelen.tike character in their intercourse with foreigners. We shall accoulingly only touch upon some of the broadest traits of this people. Our remarks apply now as always to the masses. Exception to all bad points are always to be found, and in this country there are always to be found, and in this country there are always to be found, and in this country there are always to be found, and in the statistics of the Russian character. the primitive man by the side of the refined habits of the polished European. At St. Petersburg common or promiscuous baths are strictly prohibited; most of their baths however, are of a disgusting filthiness, and, very few are even endurable by a foreigner of cleanly habits. A traveller thus describes them: "The heart sickens with disgust at the sight of a kind of emoked caverin, into which you are obliged to ponetrate. You groan on seeing in what a nest of insects you deposit your clother, and in the midds of what fifth you are about to breathe stilling vapor. What a contrast with the Turkish hearts ! Here, hideous, revolving squalidity; there, the most refined cleanliness, floods of limpid was ter, and the performes of the soap of Candia; in Russin, ind-cency, libertinge; at Constantino-ple, the most efficience of all the status of life."
