It is right to say that publication which has in all times been acknowlseased as authentic in all matters of this nature. What did Cass do, then ! Why, he did the best be could, no doubt-but he surrendered !

Did Gen. Taylor ever do this ! If the people are to evince their gratitude for military services, would any man in his senses compare those of Mr. Cass with old Zach's ! Why, the latter has accomplished with a few Yankee volunteers, what the former could not have done with ten times the mumber. But not to be invidious perticularly as no Cass-Gen. THE SURRENDER OF GEN. TAYLOR!

Our readers will doubiless be surprised at the caption en: We can no longer claim him as invincible. His laurcis must wither before the inglorious defeat which he has experienced. Here so the particulars, in few and melancholy words:—[Ed. Itappears that the General was staying at the house of Co.i. R. A Siewari, at Iberville, where he had established himself for the day. He was as unconscious of his approaching fate, as the victim decked for the air: and seemed in "umarkably fine spirits." With his approaching fate, as the victim decked for the air-dar; and seemed in "remarkably fine spirits." With an imprudence that looks like infatuation, he had thrown saide his military dress, and come out in a new full suit of black. It so happened that a wedding was going on in the neighborhood, at aMr. Le Blanc's. The bridal company were made aware of the presence of Rough and Ready in their vicinity; whereupon a most nesarious plot for his capture was said by a number of the ladies of the party. They resolved, to accomplish what Santa Anna and 20,000 picked men had failed in doing. Three of the most dangerous and charming of these fair conspirators at once organized an army for the enterprise. It was agreed that they should proceed quietly to the General's encampment, and carry it by a coup de main. We regret to state that the enterprise was entirely successful. The General unsuspicious of any hostile miovement, supposing that he was safe, now that there were no Mexicans in his vicinity, was scated at his case in a large red backed arm chair, Col. Stewart supporting him on the right, and the Colonel's lady on the left. A noise at the door, a sudden rustling of silks and satins, and the poor General's fate was scaled.—He attempted to mar duver, but it would not answer. The ditch was on the wrong side. The first general discharge from the light artillery disabled him. A "hitle more grape" from the bright eyes anned at him, a few random shots, and he surrendered at discretiou, londered to the same state of the period of general beary artillery, manned by a number of general before the beary artillery, manned by a number of general same and the same and the same and the surrendered at discretiou, londered the same and the same and the surrendered at him, a few random shots, and he surrendered at discretiou, londered the same and the efore the heavy artillery manned by a number of gen-lemen, was brought into action.

We learn from the narrator of the affair, however, as the discharge of mind year under the novel nearly the novel nearly of the affair. in the carriage with his captivators, and warterwise with all the considerations of honorable warterwise with all the considerations of honorable arms lad been declared and accepted, one of the young ladies fired several deadly shots at his heart with the brightest pair of black eyes in all Louisians. Fortunately the aim missed; but the shots in glancing killed two young gentlemen, but for which the field would have been a bloodless one. After this affair, it is obvious that the motto "General Taylor never surrenders!" will be inappropriate. It must at once be effaced from all political flage.
