Choice Poetry. TESTERDAY.

BY CHARLES WILTON. I see it now, through by-gone years, As plainly as f yore : Though grief and ago have worn life's page. And stained its traces o'er,
That fair home of boyhood's time, When the world was pure and gay, Comes sweeping back o'er memory's track,
As fresh as yesterday.

I see again the well-known scene I tread the path anew Where lily, rose, and eglantine, Commingling fragrance threw You cannot say I'm weak and old, Or that my locks are gray-The scenes of vesterday!

Thou reverend, old, and hallowed oak, I hail thee once again! The stately wave thy branches gave le solemn now as then, When underneath thy charmed shade I mused the hours away, Nor thoughttoo bright the dreams I made,

In sunny yesterday. Thou creeping vine that lov'st to tw ine Around the cottage door, And weave thy slender, netty arms My chamber lattice o'er-I've clapped my little hands for glee, As the vine that clustered fruits for me In childhood's yesterday!

That fringe the walks along— Ye modest plants that hide from view Amidst thy blooming throng— I'm bounding down your garden slope With my long forgut 'Hurra!' I'm shouting loud the song of Hope You taught me yesterday!

Alas! slas! that boyish song, For me, is hushed and still;
The blood that danced so light and long Creeps slowly now and chill; My sight grows dim-my limbs grow old-The vision fades away Though bright it seems, 'tis but the dicam Of by gone yesterday !

The lady seemed somewhat agitated, and rather silent at first, and appeared inclined fo keep her face hidden in her hat, so as not to give Halwood a view of it. After some hesitation, she told him that she loved him in secret—that he possessed the warmest affections of her heart—that ere he led his bride to the alter, she had loved upon him as the hearing shows all to there with whom she wished his bride to the altar, she had looked upon him as the being above all others with whom she wished to be united—and that it was love of him alone that made her what she was, a writer. thoughts ran over the associations of his former years, but among all acquaintances he could select none to whom he could apply the character of the lidy before him. He caught sight of her face as they passed a street lamp. There was a striking familiar look in it, but he could recollect none possessed of so much sweetness and beauty. True, he had only a hasty clance, yet in that one look, he thought he discovered marks of a noble mind. He found the jobject for which he had so often sighed, and resolved to secure it while within his grasp. He proposed that she should leave the city with him—go to a distantity—there become his wife, and then sail to a foreign land where they could dwell together in observity, and enjoy each other's society undisturbed.

At first sho appeared shocked at such a proposal, and spoke of his wife, whom he would leave behind him broken-hearted; also the disgrace with which he would be looked upon by the world at large. But Halwood was eloquent in overcoming every obstacle she could present; if he remained as he was he must be miserable; and said his wife could not be more unbappy to leave her forever, than to fael daily that although he deted the part of a husband, his heart was far from het. He fis nally succeeded in gaining her consent to his proposals, on condition that she should not reveal her true name until they should arrive at the first stopping, place. During the following week, Halwood busied himself in arranging his affairs, which were in a very good condition. He withdrew his money from the bank, and made a writing and placed it among his papers, should he not return, in which he gave his wife all the property he left behind, which was sufficient to give her a handsome support. He told Mrs. Halwood and his acquaintances, that his business called him to a distant city, and that he would be under the necessity of remaining for a few months at least, and request-ed his wife to arrange his wardrobe accordingly. ed his wife to arrange his wardrobs accordingly. The important evening came round. The time had been shorter to Halwood that he anticipated. Having all things in readiness, he took a hasty leave of his wife, sprang into his carriage at the door and soon found himself at the steamboat landing. His fair companion had not yet made her appearance. It was now 8 o'clock in the evening—half an hour dad the boat would start.—He waited twenty minutes between hope and fear, when a cab stopped near where, he was standing, and from it issued the little Quakeross; dressed in the same neat, plain style, closely veiled. Halwood stepped forward gave her a cordial greeting and conducted her on board to the ladies' cabin. She then requested him to leave her until, they should arrive at their destined port; he reducantly did so as he had promised to grant all requests she should make.

When Halwood had read the note, he said it on the table, and for a moment his better judgment told him that he had already proceeded too far in this affair, and conscience whispered, "Better sit with your wife this eve, whom you have sworn to protect." But he did not list to the voice of conscience; an opportunity offered to gratify his desire, and he resolved to improve it.
